What happened to me? I feel as if I'm ready to pull a rocking chair out on the porch and explain to the grandchildren about "back in my day, when polite people didn't bring their cellular phones to class and movies were only $5 with a student ID."

At what point did I suddenly stop being part of the younger generation and become one of "them," the middle-aged people?

According to my senior questionnaire from high school, which asked, "Where do you see yourself in five years?" I should be well on my way toward a mid-life crisis and stuck in a dead-end job by now.

I don't even have that going for me.

I hate being old.

Honor System site offers help for students

HELEN MARCOUX

Have a need to know quickly how to cite electronic sources? Tired of reading about the "average five drinks" and want to know how many K-State students self-report they have cheated at some time in their college career? Have you wondered what kinds of behavior might warrant that infamous XF on a transcript? You can find the answers to these and other questions at your fingertips.

Check it out at www.ksu.edu/honor, K-State's Undergraduate Honor System Web site has undergone a facelift. You can easily navigate categories to retrieve information about the system. Few colleges in the nation can boast a Web site as extensive as K-State's. It is considered by some to be state-of-the-art.

The www.ksu.edu/honor site allows students and faculty to navigate under eight headings, each designed with a specific purpose. The system's Honor Council information is easily accessible, including faculty and student member e-mail addresses and cameo snapshots. In-house updates are made daily for general meetings, committee work and procedural directives. For those interested in the history of the council, there is a section that deals with the honor system's evolution and mission. For students, there is information about the honor pledge, reporting a violation and becoming a member of the Honor Council.

The Honor System Web site is distinctive because the message it emphasizes is positive. One section honors those faculty who have been cited by students as exemplifying the 10 principles of academic integrity for faculty. The 10 principles are authored by the Center for Academic Integrity, a national professional organization promoting honesty is academic settings.

Another section, designed for faculty, illustrates what might be appropriate to include in a syllabus about integrity and classroom policies.

With its inception this fall, the Honor System Web site now has a section that caters specifically to students' needs. Links inform those students who might be at risk due to stresses of the semester, who are confused about citing sources (print or Web-based) or who need a lift through tutoring.

These linked sites refer students to places such as the University Counseling Center workshops, the Student Assistance Center in Holton Hall and the APA and MLA writing style Web pages. The more students learn to use these resources in their academic lives, the less they will have to encounter the Honor System.

Last fall, K-State participated in a study conducted by Donald L. McCabe, professor of organization management of Rutgers University, one of the country's leading researchers on academic integrity (you can see his picture on the rotating graphic on the home page of the Honor System's site). The results of McCabe's study may be seen at the Honor System Web site's section under the section "Recent Research." Statistics from the K-State study will be available later this fall.

Access www.ksu.edu/honor. Learn about the Honor System in the relaxed atmosphere of your residence hall room, apartment or greek house before you learn about it the hard way. If you can't remember the URL, just type "cheater" in the search engine of K-State's home page.

NOTE: There will be an Open House on Oct. 13 from 1:30 to 4:00p.m. in Fairchild 215. Everyone is welcome.

Mayor's Holiday Tree offers chance to aid those in need

Editor,

As a member of the Mayor's Holiday Tree Steering Committee, I would like to encourage everyone to support this year's food drive. The annual food drive helps to fill the Thanksgiving and Christmas food baskets for people in need in our community.

Last year, the Mayor's Holiday Tree provided 1,829 Thanksgiving baskets and 2,032 Christmas baskets. K-State students, faculty and staff contributed to 154,245 pounds of food and $22,530 in their complementary "Cats for Cans" food drive.

This year there will be many opportunities for members of the community to help us say "no" to hunger in Manhattan. One of the early opportunities will be the Hunger Dinner Kick Off event, to take place at 12:30 p.m. Nov. 5 in the Union Main Ballroom.

The Hunger Dinner experience not only serves as a kickoff to the food drive, but also makes participants tangibly aware that many people in our community are dealing with hunger in their family.

Please call the Flinthills Breadbasket at 537-0730 for information about attending the dinner or for information on how you can be a part of the drive to help eliminate hunger in our community.

activities, said.

Fallon said the group has been known to use deception in the recruitment of new members. He said they also use behavior control that stems from a discipling program that has the possibilities of extending to all areas of the members' lives.

Typically, Fallon said the group will invite new people to a Bible study, which is publicized as a general discussion, but he said they make make the new recruit question tradition, confess sins and will encourage them to become baptized in their church. He said the ICC claims to be the only true church.

Fallon said each member is assigned a discipler, who monitors daily activities and must be obeyed. He quoted a study on the group that reported 88 percent of the people were told disobeying their discipler was disobeying God.

But Fallon said his greatest concern for students who get involved with the group is the intense time they require from the members. He said this amount of time commitment might cause student to fall behind in school.

Jones said she thinks the influence of the group not only causes students to fall behind in school, but to lose control of their lives.

"What is known about the group is it has the methodology to make persons question themselves and relationships," Jones said. "There is too much focus on the group."

The church is not affiliated with the university, but Jones said the group typically targets their message at students because of their susceptibility.

"Some students have emotional issues and are vulnerable," Jones said. "They are searching for a lot of things such as their own personal identity and values. This group provides that kind of emotional support."

Scheer said she believes it is this vulnerability that led them to be targets while in Jordan.

Matt Carter, campus minister, said there are defining characteristics of the group that make the church attractive to students searching for an intense spiritual experience.

He said they typically use methods like love-bombing, in which everyone instantly is your new best friend. He said everyone is on fire for God, and there is incredible diversity within the group.

However, Carter said students interested in the group should look carefully and see how they interpret scriptures.

Chris Tang, leader of the Manhattan Christian Church, said they have 55 members, five of which are K-State students. Tang said he does not think his church is deceptive or harmful.

"We are a Bible-based church, and we believe in putting our beliefs into practice," he said. "We make the Bible a daily activity and make it the standard of life."

Tang said the the discipling program is a mentoring program for people to help each other spiritually.

"We need people in our lives, we need coaches. That is what this program is," he said.

When asked about his perceptions of the cult-like allegations, Tang dismissed the charge and said a church that is inactive and a passive part of members' lives won't get persecuted, and that criticism will always be there.

Carter said he believes the group doesn't intentionally try to be manipulative, but rather they believe their way is the truth.

Meiergerd said from his experience in Jordan the church was full of good people with just the wrong way of going about things.

"I think they are truly good people, and they are truly seeking what they think is God's will," Meiergerd said.

well as far as a source of protein and energy compared to things like beef, chicken or sheep," Zolnerowich said.

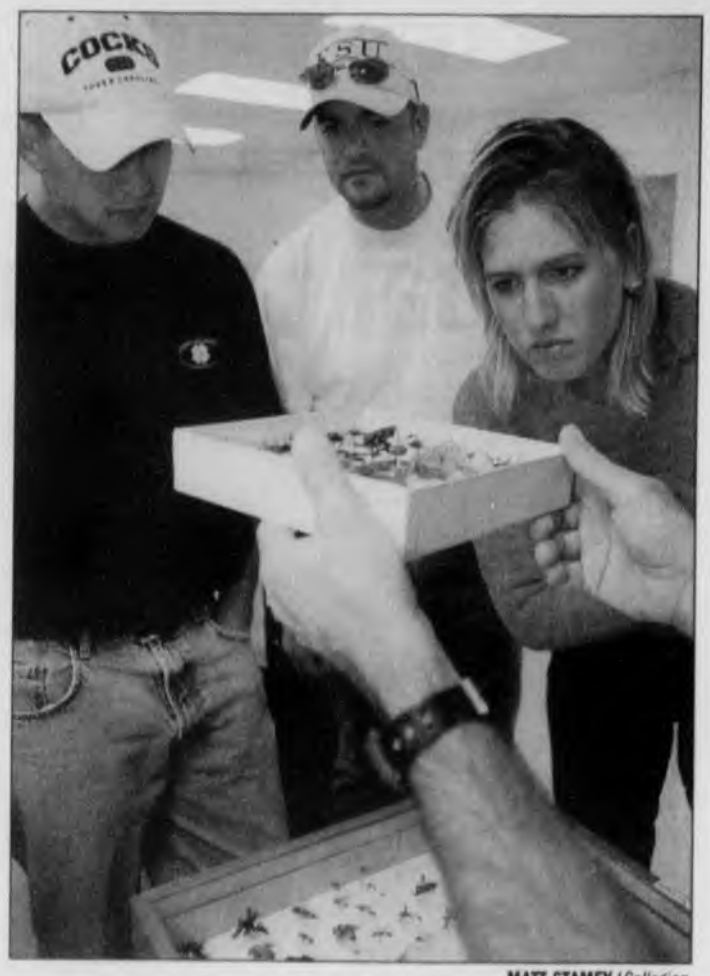
Entomology 250 students will be tying on the aprons and cooking insect delicacies such as garlic mealworms during class. Those willing to taste the product will receive extra credit.

The course also delves into the role of insects in history. Those carriers of disease caused plagues and impacted wars.

Napoleon was forced to turn back from the invasion of Russia, because he lost many men to diseases such as typhus that was vectored by lice.

Zolnerowich said during World War I more people were killed by diseases spread by insects than actual casualties of war.

The movie industry also can influence how people perceive insects.



Zolnerowich also offers extra credit that involves watching insect-related movies. Students then must write a report discussing the plot and deciding what aspects of the film were biologically accurate.

Zolnerowich said he strives to make the course appealing to students. Many students agree his teaching method contributes to the success of the class.

"He's real laid back," Crystal Gonzalez, senior in animal science, said.

While other students are learning math and foreign languages, Entomology 250 students are learning that termites cause $1 billion in damage yearly, ants and termites are mortal enemies, and the phrase 'cooties' derives from body lice.

"Insects are cool," Zolnerowich said. "They're just so cool."

DEBATE

— a contention Texas Gov. Bush denounced as fuzzy math.

Both candidates were aggressive; both counterpunched.

For his part, Bush took a risk in zeroing in on the character issue. In response to a question from moderator Jim Lehrer, Bush criticized Gore for uttering the words 'no controlling legal authority' when questions were raised about fund raising for the 1996 Clinton-Gore re-election.

"There ought to be a better sense of responsibility," Bush said, also referring to President Clinton's invitation to big Democratic donors to sleepovers in the Lincoln bedroom and hinting at other administration misdeeds.

"You may want to focus on scandals, I want to focus on results," Gore shot back.

"Both achieved minimum expectations," said Stuart Elway, an independent pollster in Seattle. "Bush didn't mispronounce a lot of words and was able to answer all the questions. Gore didn't get overly pedantic."

Elway said Bush seemed to answer the moderator's questions, while Gore was intent on saying what he wanted to say.

Elway said both candidates lived up to their reputations.

"I haven't seen a presidential debate that has seemed to me to be as evenly matched," said Fred Greenstein, a political science professor at Princeton University. "No one shot himself in the foot. No one scored a knockout. There was no humor."

Bush did appear a little weaker — and Gore more sure-footed — in his answer on dealing with Slobodan Milosevic, the defiant Yugoslav leader, suggested several analysts.

But if the first debate did not hold out the prospect of any major shift in the dynamics of the race, that's probably better news for Gore than for Bush, suggested Thomas Mann, an analyst with the Brookings Institution, a Washington-based think tank.

"Bush was intelligent and intelligible. But this election will not be decided on which candidate we like the most," Mann said. He said the still-booming economy, peace in the world and the salability of Gore's proposals still gives Gore the upper hand.

Annual tournament honors lacrosse coach

JEANEL DRAKE/Collegian

Matt Ruemker of the K-State lacrosse team played in Sunday's match against the Minnesota Chill in the Donnie Tillar Lacrosse Classic at Memorial Stadium. K-State was defeated in the match 2-14.

By DAN SMITH
Kansas State Collegian

K-State's lacrosse club owes its existence to one man.

While a soldier at Fort Riley, 1st Lt. Donnie Tillar gathered enough players to field a team and registered with the school to become a club sport, with Tillar as the coach.

While heading the club, Tillar was called to serve in the Gulf War, and on Feb. 27, 1991, he was killed in action.

With his distinct style of lacrosse left behind, the club decided to develop an annual tournament that demonstrates the same organized, dedicated and fun-loving qualities that Tillar instilled in his players.

This year's two-day tournament took place Saturday and Sunday at K-State's Chester E. Peters Recreational Complex and Memorial Stadium, respectively.

Six teams, including three from the Big 12, took up their sticks and battled it out at the Donnie Tillar Memorial Classic in Manhattan, with the Minnesota Chill taking home the title and the Cats finishing second.

K-State played a tight, back-and-forth game against Kansas City's 4-Winds team to kick off the tournament's action Saturday.

With the score tied at five at the end of regulation, the Cat club pulled together and scored the winning goal early in the overtime period to begin the tournament with a win.

"Saturday was really great, and everybody played well," junior club president Nick Miller said.

"Everybody decided that we would play together. We turned up the intensity, and we managed to score quickly in overtime."

On Sunday, K-State lacked the offensive power to hang with the Chill, and lost 14-2.

Individual and team practice, head coach John Culbertson said, will help the team to become more competitive when the Cats start play in the Central Collegiate Lacrosse Association next semester.

"Saturday was really great, and everybody played well. Everybody decided that we would play together. We turned up the intensity, and we managed to score quickly in overtime."

Nick Miller, junior club president

"Right now, we have a lot of young players," Culbertson said. "We'll start with a more complicated offense in the spring. I want to develop these players into the caliber that can compete in this league."

Culbertson is in his first year as head coach and played K-State lacrosse in 1994. Although he said he is grateful for the new opportunity, he said the pressure is a lot greater as a coach than as a player.

"I had no idea what went on behind the scenes," Culbertson said of his new duties. "It's been an eye-opener and it's been stressful, but I think that we have a pretty good chance to be successful this year."

One of Culbertson's main concerns in his first year is the lack of experience on the team. But with the success of the young team early in the year, young players such as sophomore attack Shane Apple are looking forward to filling the shoes of their predecessors.

"I'm trying to be more of a leader," Apple said, "and do whatever I can do to help the team out."

Equestrian to compete this weekend at Texas

By STEVEN DEARINGER
Kansas State Collegian

K-State's newest varsity sport, equestrian, will make its debut this weekend.

The women's western equestrian team, consisting of 32 riders, will travel to West Texas A&M in Canyon, Texas, to open its season Friday in a two-day event. Among the competition is Texas A&M and last year's national champion Oklahoma State.

Although K-State will compete in two styles of equestrian this year, Western and English, the Western technique will be the focus for this weekend's competition.

"Western is like what you see cowboys riding," head equestrian coach Teresa Slough said. "The saddles have a horn. One hand on the reins, wear a hat and chaps."

The main difference between Western and English styles are the moves.

"Western horsemanship — they will be asked to ride around the arena as a walk, trot and lope," Slough said. "Judges look at how well they ride, communicate with the horse, balance on the horse, use their hand and how they use their feet and legs.

"Then they will be asked to do a pattern that the judge has prescribed. It's going to involve a series of maneuvers, stops, turns, figure eights, straight lines, and again, they are just looking at how well the rider handles the horse."

Upper level riders also can compete in reigning, which is a pattern that involves more spins and turns. In turn, riders are ranked from best rider down.

English, on the other hand, is fence-jumping as well as riding along the rail similar to Western, but there is no pattern.

This weekend's event will be a three Western, which means that each rider will ride three times.

However, throughout those three rides, the competitor won't have the experience of riding that particular horse before.

"When we go to competition, you draw a horse randomly that you have never ridden before and you don't get the opportunity to ride it before the competition," said Kelly Gratny, junior and last year's runner-up at nationals. "You go straight into the arena and ride on a rail and do patterns, and you are judged on how you handle the horse."

That random horse selection causes riders must rely on their own abilities, freshman Stephanie Budde said.

"The draw doesn't matter," she said. "It's how you ride and act on a horse that counts. It's all up to me."

Yet it won't be easy for the Wildcats in their first competition.

"It's going to be tough," Slough said. "I wish we had a little more time to get ready for this first show. Almost all of our riders are new to this."

K-State tennis team matches record, continues to improve

By SAM STIERS
Kansas State Collegian

Improved effort and competition during practice have elevated the play of K-State's women's tennis team, head tennis coach Steve Bietau said.

UP NEXT
K-State opens its fall season at the Indiana Hoosier Classic tournament, Oct. 6-8, in Bloomington, Ind.

The Cats finished 14-9 last year, tying the team record for most wins in a season. However, Bietau said this year's squad has a chance of breaking the record.

"There are a lot of variables involved," Bietau said. "A lot of things can happen between now and March and April. But I think everyone who's returned has made some progress, and in terms of the work level and effort made in practice, we're at a higher level than we were last year.

"The thing we have going for us now is we have more experience. We have a number of players returning who've had some success and have a better understanding of what it takes to win."

The Cats will have to exhibit that winning attitude without the presence of Anna Pampoulova, who finished her eligibility last year. Bietau said filling her shoes will be an important task for the returning players and incoming freshman.

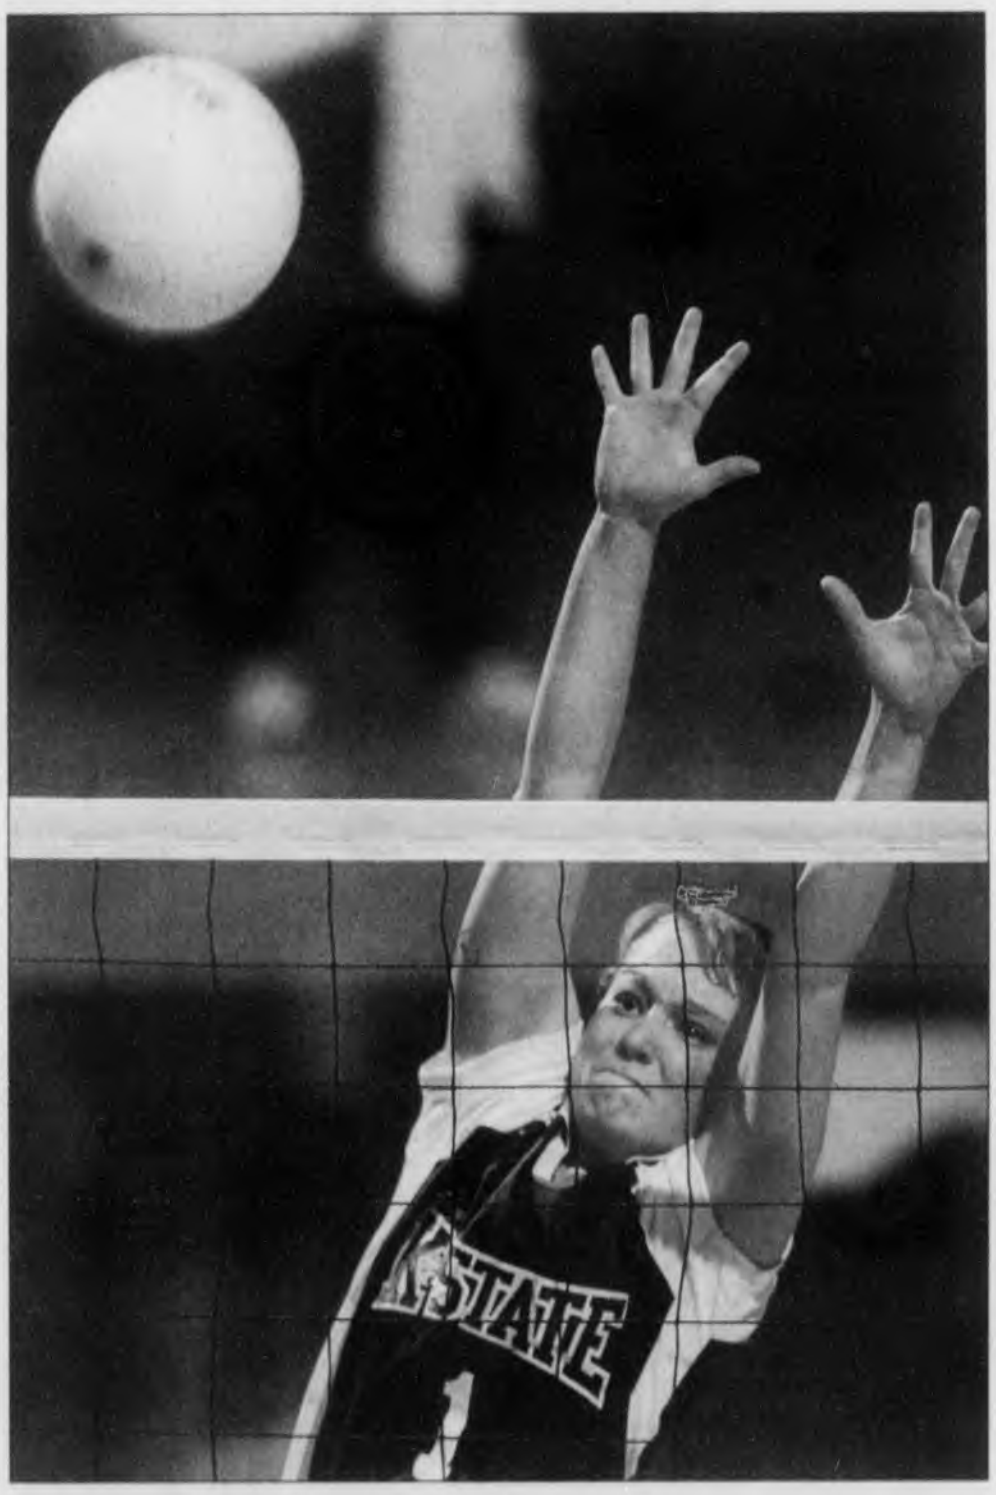
"The questions that remain to be answered are how well will the freshman do and how quickly can they adapt," Bietau said. "They're going to need to fill in some important roles."

Junior Alena Jecminkova said she is confident the freshmen and the rest of the team will come together and play well.

"I'm sure they can play well," she said. "They just have to get used to the team and get into playing here."

Jecminkova was the only K-State player to make the NCAA Tournament last season. She heads into this season ranked No. 100 nationally and is joined in the national rankings by sophomore teammate Petra Sedlmajerova, who is ranked No. 63.

"I think we have three players who are at a high level right now," Bietau said. "Of course, last season Petra and Alena were clearly number one and number two. But if I were to go only off performance in practice, I'd say Eva Novotna' is our best player."



Novotna' is a senior and said she feels a sense of urgency in her final season on the team.

"It's my last year here and it's the final countdown, so I've been going out and practicing really hard," Novotna' said. "I'm just trying to enjoy every minute, and I'm playing the best tennis of my K-State career."

Novotna' and Sedlmajerova comprise the Cats number one doubles team that is ranked No. 49 in the country.

Novotna' said being ranked helps motivate her to prove that ranking is justified.

"Me and Petra played together all last year," Novotna' said. "We put in a lot of work and it will be a challenge to become better than the ranking we have."

Cats put Jayhawks away for 11th straight time

By MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

If the K-State volleyball players had any lingering doubts after getting swept by Missouri on Saturday, they didn't show it last night in Ahearn Field House.

The Cats (10-4, 4-2) captured their 11th straight victory over Kansas (11-5, 2-5) with a strong three-game sweep, 15-6, 17-15, 15-13.

The Jayhawks didn't just lay down, however. K-State had to come from behind in all three games, a credit to Kansas, outside hitter Liz Wegner said.

"They're fighters and never give up. We knew they were going to come in here and just keep working," she said. "They played a great game. We just hung in there and were able to put them away."

When K-State did put the Jayhawks away, they did so in impressive fashion. In the first game, for instance, the Cats finished on a 12-1 run. In the second game, K-State reversed its habit of losing games at the end and stopped Kansas on eight game-point opportunities.

The difference, Wegner said, was the Cats' ability to do the little things.

"We picked up a lot more tips, and we dug a lot more balls," Wegner said. "We chased down a lot more balls, and I think that's what made the difference."

Another difference was that the Cats didn't hurt themselves with service errors as they had previously in the season, especially against Missouri. They still had too many Wednesday, but the Cats played well in the crunch, head coach Jim McLaughlin said.

"We didn't miss at critical times," he said. "I thought we kept the pressure on them especially at the end of games, and that enabled us to make good comebacks."

Part of the reason K-State improved its play was due to changes in the line-up. Wegner moved from the right side to the outside to give her more shots at the ball, and the change paid off. The junior's 29 kills broke the K-State record for kills in a three-game match.

The numbers don't lie, McLaughlin said. Wegner really is that good.

"I think Liz is the best outside hitter in the Big 12," he said. "She's breaking school records, and I'm asking her to be even better the next week. I don't think we've seen Liz at her best."

Freshman middle blocker Lauren Goehring also cracked the starting line-up for the first time this season. Despite her inexperience, Goehring's play during practice made the move inevitable, McLaughlin said.

"She's got the best numbers in the gym right now," he said. "She needs to be on the floor — she deserves it. She had 24 attempts, nine kills, one error. She's a freshman, and she's getting numbers like that? Wait until down the road."

In contrast to Goehring's emergence, freshman Cari Jensen, who had seen considerable playing time prior to last night, never saw the floor against Kansas. The disappearing act was the result of Jensen's lack of execution during practice, McLaughlin said.

"Right now, it's just a function of numbers," he said. "It's a function of execution and efficiency."

Yugoslavian court annuls parts of presidential election

By JOVANA GEC
Associated Press Writer

BELGRADE, Yugoslavia — In what might be an attempt to buy time for Slobodan Milosevic, Yugoslavia's highest court invalidated parts of the presidential election Wednesday, after thousands of opposition supporters forced police to back off from seizing a strikebound mine.

The constitutional court ruling, reported by the state news agency Tanjug, came in a case brought by the opposition, which sought to have Vojislav Kostunica declared the winner of last month's election.

Instead, the court annulled parts of the election, the agency said, adding details of the ruling would be made public Thursday. If the presidential vote, or even parts of it, must be repeated, it means Milosevic retains power longer.

The announcement came on the eve of a planned mass rally in Belgrade that the opposition hoped would be the final push to force Milosevic to concede defeat.

Milosevic acknowledges Kostunica finished first in a five-candidate field Sept. 24, but without a majority needed to avoid a runoff Sunday. The opposition has rejected a runoff.

Opposition official Goran Svilanovic said he believes the opposition will also not agree to take part in a rerun of the first round.

"We have our elected president," he said. "These are things we can discuss, but my initial reaction is that there can be no bargaining."

The opposition, challenging the official findings of the Federal Electoral Commission, went to Yugoslavia's highest court earlier Wednesday, appealing to the justices to grant them victory in the presidential elections.

The court met in emergency session Wednesday to hear complaints by the 18-party opposition coalition, maintaining Milosevic's supporters manipulated election results by using a sophisticated software program.

Opposition leaders said they had obtained a copy of the program and would use it to illustrate how the vote was rigged to favor Milosevic's candidacy.

Earlier Wednesday, Milosevic's police abandoned barricades at a striking coal mine 25 miles south of Belgrade and mingled with thousands of workers seeking to topple the Yugoslav president.

The turnout gave opposition forces hope that the regime was mortally wounded.

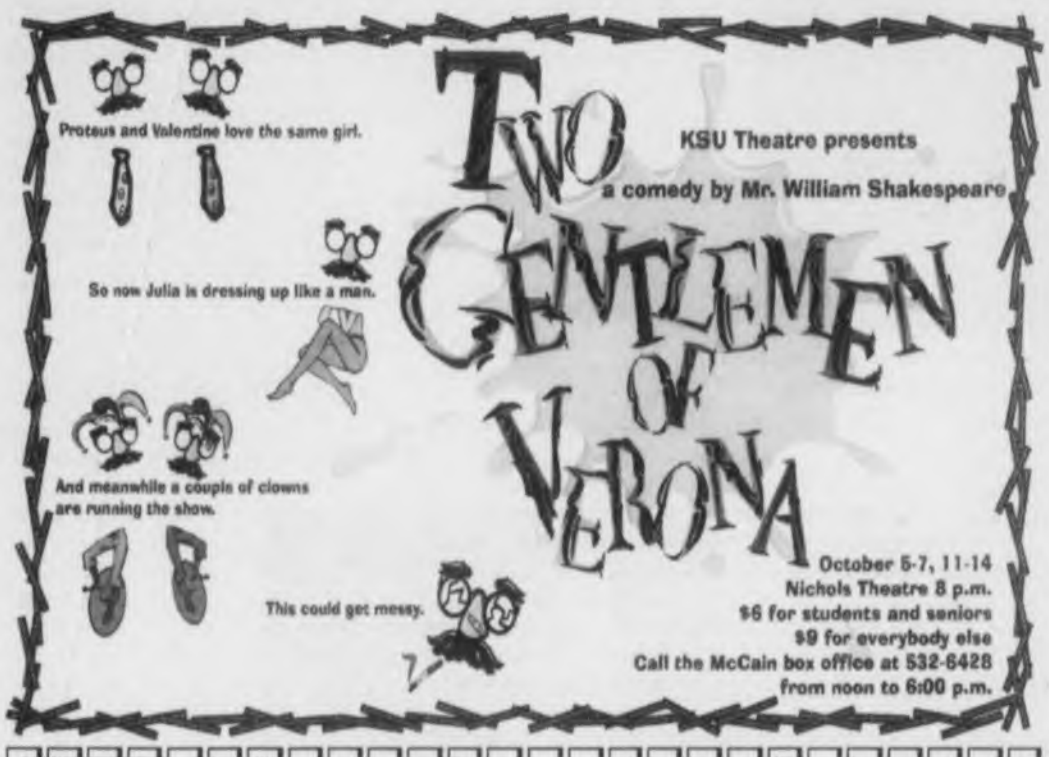
"The battle for Serbia was won here," Dragan Kovacevic said.

The stunning and swift turn of events at the Kolubara mine complex was unprecedented in a former communist nation with no history of large worker uprisings. It caught even top opposition figures off guard. They rushed to join more than 10,000 protesters at the mine and predicted Milosevic's quick demise.

Opposition leaders issued an ultimatum for Milosevic to resign by 3 p.m. Thursday, the time set for the Belgrade rally.

"This flame will engulf the whole of Belgrade," Vladan Batic, an opposition leader, said.

In an open letter Wednesday to Milosevic before the court's ruling, Kostunica said "it will be better for you to recognize" electoral defeat or risk "the danger of open clashes" nationwide.



"Serbia has risen so that one man would leave," Kostunica said.

Only hours earlier, police in riot gear had poured in and occupied the strip mine complex in an attempt to break up the largest of the nationwide strikes against Milosevic. But the police couldn't contain a swelling crowd that heeded the workers' cry for help.

With sunset approaching, the police gave up. Most withdrew from their barricades and were mingling with strikers inside the compound.

Supporters of the strikers streamed in on foot and in convoys of vehicles. One bus pushed aside a police car blocking its way.

A few police remained guarding some areas of the mine, but made no attempt to control the joyous crowd.

People are different, always have been. But these days it seems like our lifestyles are more diverse than ever before. Which means we all have different needs, especially in health care. So instead of a one-size-fits-all health insurance plan that limits your options, why not select a plan that leaves choices up to you? The Preferred Health Systems Insurance Company PPO lets you choose when and where you want to get your health care, who you want to get it from, and you rarely need a referral.

A product of Preferred Health Systems, the same company that offers the popular Preferred Plus of Kansas HMO, our PPO plan gives you open access to the largest provider network in the state, with nearly 4,000 providers across Kansas. You even have the option of using non-network providers if you wish. So how you manage your health care is up to you.

Wrestler wins with strength, skill

■ Student dominates K-State's intramural wrestling competition with experience, concentration.

By DAN SMITH
Kansas State Collegian

For Marques Jackson, wrestling is about concentration and focus.

Before each match, Jackson enters a warmup ritual that lasts anywhere from 15 to 30 minutes. Intent on dominating each match he enters, he methodically jumps up and down to break a sweat, and with his rap music blaring through his headphones, Jackson observes every move of his competitors, looking for weaknesses to exploit with his quickness and strength on the mat.

This pre-match warmup is what makes Jackson successful in collegiate wrestling. That focus, Jackson said, is the key to success.

In his first year in Manhattan, Jackson has had to adjust to the absence of a collegiate wrestling program at K-State. However, he made plenty of noise last week in the university's annual intramural wrestling competition.

But Jackson is used to making some noise.

Jackson comes to K-State after two years of big-match experience and wrestling tradition at Neosho County Community College, the defending NJCAA national champions, where he said he became a different type of wrestler than the defensive one he was at Sumner Academy in Kansas City, Mo.

"In high school, I did enough to barely win," Jackson said, "but in college wrestling, you can't be defensive and you can't stall, they'll get you every time. You have to take your opportunities and be aggressive — that's how you win matches."

Sophomore Jason Ross, out of Spring Hill High School, competed against Jackson during his prep career and remembers him as a much different wrestler than today.

"In high school, he'd let you do all the moves, he'd let you make mistakes and then he'd take advantage of you," Ross said. "Since he went to Neosho for two years, he's completely different.

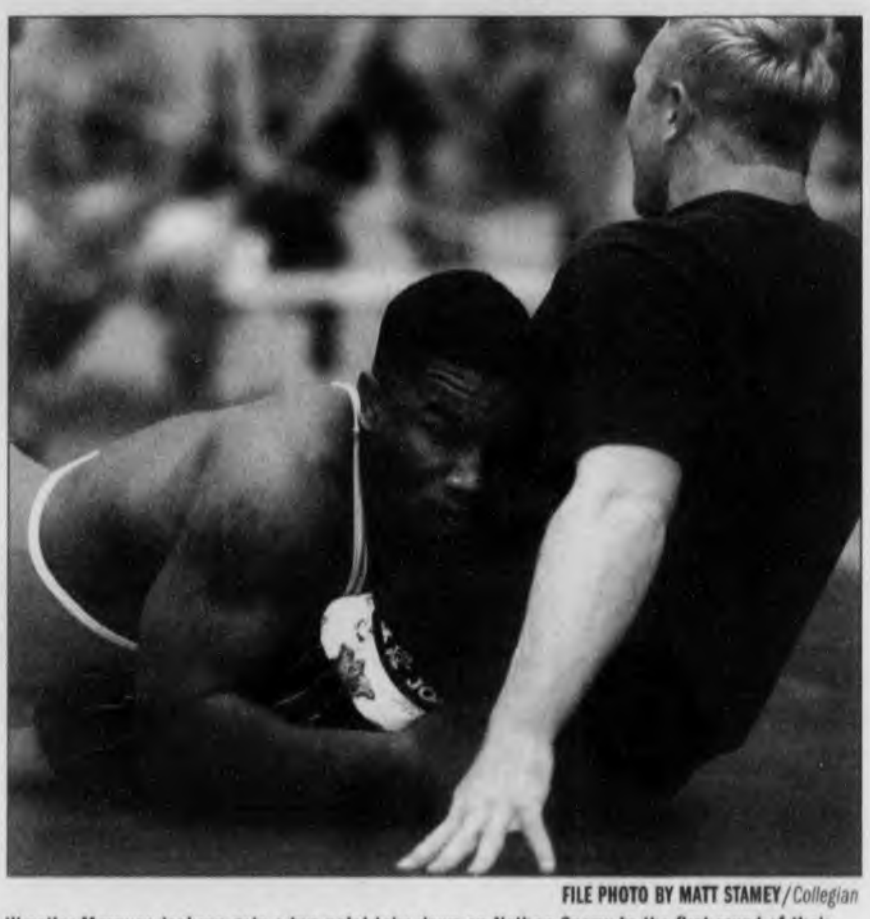
"He's attacking a lot more, he's twice the size he used to be and he's using his strength and his quickness to make people make errors."

Jackson, a state champion in high school, suffered three concussions at Neosho County, but said he doesn't know how to wrestle any other way than with all his effort.

"I got experience wrestling with the top guys," Jackson said, "I've seen some things and done some things that no one else has done."

And Jackson put on a show last week at the Chester E. Peters Recreational Complex that probably would have made both his Neosho coaches and teammates proud.

Coming into the intramural competition, Jackson was confident with his ability.



"I'm going to win it all," Jackson said.

After breezing through the preliminary matches, Jackson again warmed up to take on freshman Nick Rodina for the championship. Rodina was making his first appearance on the wrestling mats but said he had a good time.

"I always wanted to wrestle in high school, but we never had the opportunity," Rodina said. "I have better respect for the sport, and I'd definitely do it again."

Rodina was overmatched and was no contest for the bigger and stronger Jackson. Jackson took advantage of Rodina's inexperience and won the match 19-8. After the loss, Rodina said Jackson's experience was a factor.

"He's definitely a great athlete," Rodina said. "You can tell he's done this before — he's real quick and strong."

Football's victories boost K-State's image

By NANCY FOSTER
Kansas State Collegian

"Futility U" was how K-State was referred to 12 years ago in a Sports Illustrated article.

Now, more than a decade after the article, K-State was voted the trendiest school in the nation. The changed perception of K-State, administrators said, is partly due to the success of the football team.

"K-State football has had a tremendous positive affect on so many aspects of the university," Pat Bosco, dean of student life, said.

He said it has been a rallying point for academics, public relations and recruitment.

"We have seen an increase in the number of out-of-state applications in the last three years," he said. "And we believe this is due to the positive exposure from the football program."

Bosco said actual enrollment numbers have not varied a great deal since the football program's success, but the the number of people who apply and are accepted have.

"There are so many factors that affect the actual enrollment," he said.

He said with or without the successful program, K-State has been able to maintain its market share of enrollment. Even though it hasn't affected actual enrollment figures, having the positive exposure is always beneficial, he said.

"I think anything that reflects positively on K-State can only help our ability to get students, raise money and involve alumni in our student affairs," Bosco said. "It can't hurt. It can only help."

Jon Richardson, sophomore in mechanical engineering, said he thinks the football program has had a definite effect on how the university is perceived.

"I think it really brings the school together with spirit," he said. "And I think nationally, people notice us more because of our football program."

Richardson said his little brother was a prime example of the effect it's had.

"That's why he likes K-State, because of our football program," he said.

Bob Krause, vice president for institutional advancement, said that what football has done in terms of uplifting spirit and pride is incredible.

He said right or wrong, athletics become a window through which many people view the university and get to know it. The reputation the football program has gained has created many benefits for K-State.

Krause said the first benefit is that it allows K-State to have a major conference affiliation. Other benefits are that it also has allowed the university to elevate other programs in the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics, provide scholarships and improve the marching band to a top-10 program, he said.

Jim Hodgson, freshman in architecture, said he thinks the football team's success has benefited the university by not only attracting students, but financially as well.

"People are paying a lot of money for season tickets and parking," he said.

He said he also thinks donations to the school have increased.

Karen Schroeder, director of communications at the KSU Alumni Association, said she has seen an affect on alumni participation.

"Specifically, our number of watch parties have increased," she said.

Watch parties are alumni clubs that gather together in either a sports bar or restaurant and watch the televised games. She said there has been a significant increase even since 1997. In 1997, there were 182 out-of-state watch parties, which 5,558 people attended. In 1999, there were 259 watch parties, which 9,179 people attended.

Manhattan couple opens restaurant to accommodate breakfast, lunch crowd, finds family time

By REED DUNN
Kansas State Collegian

Three children are the reason behind Early Edition's hours.

David and Marcy Uphoff knew they wanted to open a restaurant with hours to accommodate a breakfast, brunch and lunch crowd, but more importantly, one where they could spend time raising their children together.

"There's a lot of business that's out there at night, but our primary reason to close early is for family and quality of life," David Uphoff said.

Early Edition, which serves breakfast and lunch items, is open from 6 a.m. to 2:30 p.m. Monday through Friday, and from 7 a.m. o 2:30 p.m. on weekends.

Elaine and Cameron, the couple's oldest children, attend grade school during the weekdays, while their 8-month-old son, Cole, goes with them to the restaurant.

"He hasn't had a day off in six months," David Uphoff said.

On weekends, all of the children can be found hanging around the restaurant. Marcy Uphoff said that for the most part, the children like to feel they are helping out.

"Cameron likes to help in the kitchen," she said. "Elaine likes to be up front, and I think she's ready to run the cash register."

Before opening the restaurant, the couple lived in the Kansas City metro area, where similar dining establishments had proven successful. The restaurant's location on 3210 Kimball Avenue in Candlewood Shopping Center was one that made sense to the Uphoff family.

"There seems to be a lot of development on the west side of Manhattan, and that played an important role in coming out here," David Uphoff said. "The main attractions for us were Colbert Hills, and we felt the university was relatively close."

Since the March 20 opening, the couple has seen the number of regular clients rapidly increase. Little advertising has been done, but through word of mouth, things have been working out, Marcy Uphoff said.

"We have an incredible repeat business, and that came very quickly," she said.

Having a quality menu to please each customer was important for the couple, so David Uphoff talked with friends and put together a menu from his knowledge of working in the industry.

"Some is what we've seen out there, and some of it is what we have created here," he said.

MATT STAMEY/Collegian

David and Marcy Uphoff sit with their son, Cole, in Early Edition. The restaurant serves breakfast, brunch and lunch and is open from 6 a.m. to 2:30 p.m.

The menu has a variety of breakfast items, such as pancakes, waffles and omelet dishes, but also has a range of sandwich and salad options geared toward the lunch crowd.

Marcy Uphoff said part of having a family and owning a restaurant is understanding quality, as well as affordability. She attributes this to the success she and her husband already have seen.

"We know what it's like to take a family out," she said. "It's really worked for us. Good food, good service."

Julie Skinner, Manhattan resident, has become one of the restaurant's many repeat visitors. She said it is not uncommon for her to take friends or family to the establishment three or four times a week.

"I've gotten to where I don't want to go anywhere else," Skinner said.

The fact the restaurant is smoke-free and has a clean, friendly atmosphere is what Skinner said sets Early Edition apart from other Manhattan establishments. She said the Uphoffs take pride in making sure their customers are pleased.

"The food is most of the reason I go there, but the people there are the reason I go back," she said.

"They really care about their customers being happy."

Cookbook offers cost-efficient ways to eat

By LYNNE HERMANSEN
Kansas State Collegian

Saving money doesn't mean being reduced to eating ramen noodles for every meal.

People with limited funds, including college students, looking for a creative way to save money can benefit from the cookbook "Not Just Beans: 50 Years of Frugal Family Living."

The easy-to-read cookbook, put together by Manhattan resident Tawra Kellam, includes more than 540 recipes and 400 cooking tips to help families and people living a frugal lifestyle.

"The book not only provides great-tasting recipes that are easy to make with common ingredients," Kellam said, "but also gives tips that anyone can use to trim hard-to-manage budgets."

Kellam said she decided to put the cookbook together after numerous people continually asked for recipes.

"I was on bed rest with both my pregnancies, chatting on the Internet about frugal living," Kellam said. "After countless times of people wanting my recipes, I thought it would be a great idea to combine all of them in one book."

The recipes and cooking tips come from three generations of Kellam's family. Kellam's mother raised two teen-agers on $500 a month, and taught Kellam how to live a frugal lifestyle.

Kellam said she now feeds her own family of four on $125 a month.

"It's been a way of life for us. We have always lived this way," Kellam said. "We put money towards other things than spending it all on food."

Kellam said the family goes out to eat on average once a month.

"We go to eat to celebrate occasions such as birthdays. It makes it more special," she said.

In the past five years, Kellam said she and her husband paid off $20,000 personal debt on an average total income of $22,000 per year.

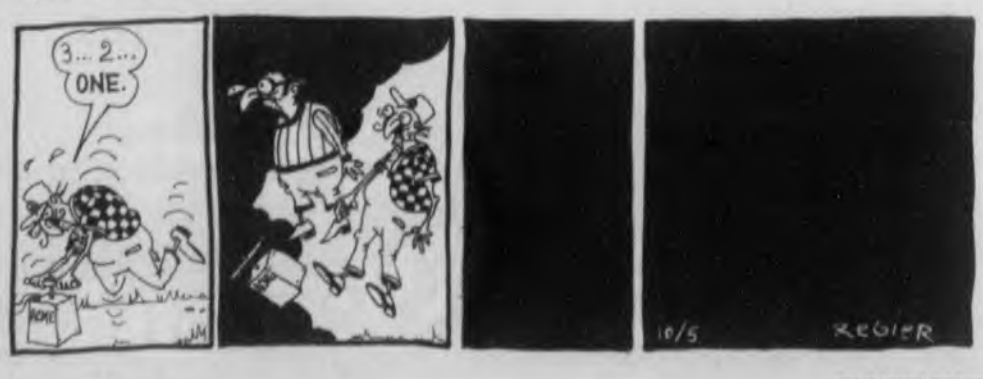
"I enjoy the challenge of developing new ways to save money and reduce personal debt," she said.

Some topics covered in the cookbook include creative uses of leftovers, lunch and snack ideas, how to save at the grocery store and 400 frugal household tips, time savers and hints.

"My desire is to show that anyone, including college students, can cut their daily living expenses without feeling deprived," Kellam said.

Kellam said her cookbook includes recipes for buttermilk, enchilada sauce, Zwieback, classic favorites and old-fashioned comfort foods.

Elaine Williams, reporter for the Lewiston Morning Tribune, said Kellam's cookbook has some creative ways to cut back.



"Kellam seems to have mastered the art of taking simple foods and turning them into something special," Williams said.

Jonni McCoy, author of "Miserly Moms and Frugal Families," said Kellam's cookbook shows that having a limited budget does not have to leave a person feeling hungry.

"Every frugal family should have this book. It is full of tasty recipes and ideas for feeding a family without overspending," McCoy said. "It pays for itself in the first few meals."

Craft fair for health center to be this weekend at CiCo

By JENNIFER O'NEILL
Kansas State Collegian

Halloween is creeping up, and so is the 27th annual Pumpkin Patch Arts and Crafts Fair this Friday and Saturday.

Throughout the years, people from all over Kansas have come out to CiCo Park in Manhattan to enjoy a day of crafts and food sponsored by the Mercy Health Center Auxiliary, a volunteer organization that supports Mercy Health Center Inc.

More than 140 exhibitors from Kansas, Missouri, Nebraska, Iowa and Oklahoma will be at the fair selling art, pottery, books, jewelry, clothes, Christmas items, K-State memorabilia, flowers and much more.

"Our fair has a great reputation," Virginia Babcock, chairwoman of the fair, said. "People expect to get good things here, and they come intending to buy."

"Our fair has a great reputation. People expect to get good things here, and they come intending to buy."

Virginia Babcock, chairwoman of the fair

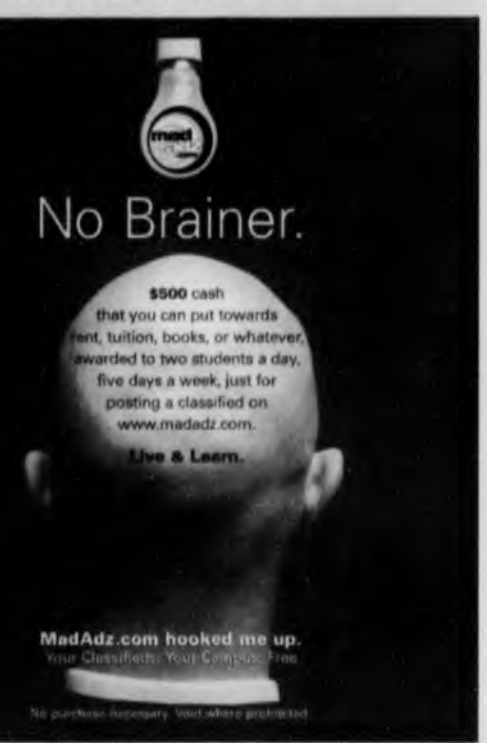
Westside Market will be selling pumpkins, and the American Institute of Baking will be there raising money for scholarships.

Babcock said exhibitors wait all year for the fair because of the huge amount of products they sell.

"It's also a great social time for the members of the auxiliary." Delores Boulding, president of the auxiliary, said, "The fair brings a lot of us members together for a good cause."

Proceeds from booth rentals and food sales go to benefit Mercy.

Karen Brockenicky, chairwoman of last year's fair, said the auxiliary raised $15,000 for the hospital.



Previous donations have gone to helping outfit the nursery, women's radiology and the mini-ambulance. Since the hospital is in the middle of renovation plans, where this year's donation will go still is undecided.

Admission is free and hours for the fair are from 10 a.m. to 8 p.m. Friday and 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. Saturday. There will be a special shopping from 9 to 10 a.m. both days reserved for senior citizens and people with disabilities.

K-State to vote to gain control over tuition

AT A GLANCE

Now there are two main revenue streams for colleges and universities – state general tax dollars and tuition. The state looks at both of these as a single revenue stream when allocating money to the university.

With approval of the board, each university could bypass sending tuition dollars to the state treasury and create its own tuition structure and rates.

By JESSICA LEDUC
Kansas State Collegian

A budget proposal before the Kansas Board of Regents could change the way Kansas universities manage their tuition.

Tuition ownership is a significant part of a proposal that will allow the six regents universities to have more control over fiscal matters.

Under the current system, the universities collect tuition, then send the money to the state treasury. The treasury, in turn, allocates the money back to the universities through budget requests. Regent Bill Docking said that, with the new proposal, the university would collect the tuition and keep the money.

"This will make the university better able to manage its money and resources," Docking said.

With the new proposal, each of the six regents universities would assess, collect and have expenditure authority over all tuition revenue. With approval of the board, each university could have its own tuition structure and tuition rates.

Tom Rawson, vice president for administration and finance, said this proposal would change the current finance model. There are two main revenue streams — state general tax dollars and tuition. The state looks at both of these as a single revenue stream when allocating money to the university.

"We want to separate these two revenue streams," Rawson said. "Tuition will be collected by K-State and will be a K-State resource."

Although the universities across Kansas might be affected by this change, there are several special institutions that will not implement the proposal. The College of Veterinary Medicine, the K-State Extension Systems and Agriculture Research Programs and the KU Medical Center will not change from the current system.

"These three special institutions will retain the current model," Rawson said.

Student Body President Jake Worcester said tuition ownership would be a positive proposal for K-State.

"It's a positive proposal, especially from an equity standpoint. It allows the university to have ownership of its tuition, and they can use it as they see fit," Worcester said.

Rawson said it is not yet known how K-State's tuition would compare to other universities across Kansas if this proposal is passed.

"We would have more flexibility to have university rates structured to K-State. Our tuition rates may be identical to KU's," Rawson said.

A block grant also is part of the budget proposal. Each of the six regents universities would receive its state funding in the form of a General Fund block grant, based on a request determined by the Board.

In addition to requests for grants, universities could request financial support for program

Yugoslavian revolution begins

Clinton keeps military away from problems in Yugoslavia

By ROBERT BURNS
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — President Clinton ruled out U.S. military intervention in Yugoslavia's civil uprising and administration officials urged Russia to use its influence to persuade President Slobodan Milosevic to step aside.

Pentagon spokesmen said the approximately 5,200 U.S. troops in Bosnia and 6,700 in Kosovo — part of separate multinational peacekeeping forces — were not on a heightened state of alert, and that U.S. forces had detected no signs of unusual movements by the Serb army in Kosovo or other parts of the country.

At the White House, Clinton branded Milosevic's government a hard-core dictatorship, and said, "We support democracy and the will of the Serbian people."

As rumors swirled that Milosevic had fled Yugoslavia, National Security Adviser Sandy Berger said Thursday evening, "At this stage, we have no reason to believe he is not in Belgrade. I don't think anybody knows what his intention is."

Berger said Milosevic "is perfectly capable of trying to make a last stand. I think that the pillars of his power that have kept him in ■ Nation rocked by rioting in wake of elections calling for Milosevic's resignation.

By DUSAN STOJANOVIC
The Associated Press

BELGRADE, Yugoslavia — Mobs seeking to topple Slobodan Milosevic turned their fury on his centers of power Thursday, leaving parliament and other key Belgrade sites in shambles and flames. The 13-year rule of the Yugoslav president appeared to have collapsed.

"As of today, Serbia is again a democratic nation," declared an opposition leader, Nebojsa Covic, referring to Yugoslavia's main republic. "It belongs to all of us, to Europe and to the world."

Earlier in the day, hundreds of thousands of people swarmed through the capital to demand that Milosevic accept his apparent electoral defeat by Vojislav Kostunica in the Sept. 24 election.

The uprising developed with stunning speed, swelling as security forces showed little willingness to battle the largest anti-Milosevic protest ever.

Some police who did fire on demonstrators were beaten. The government's Tanjug news agency, which defected to the opposition, said two people were killed and 65 injured in the rioting. All but 12 of the injured were treated and released from hospitals, Tanjug said.

Many police put down their clubs and joined flag-waving crowds as they surged across central Belgrade through clouds of tear gas. As demonstrators charged and riot police Opposition supporters gathered Thursday outside the Parliament building in Belgrade, Yugoslavia. Protesters have taken over the building in Belgrade center and the state television station as they continue to demand that President Slobodan Milosevic step down from power and accept the recent election results that indicate he was defeated.

cowered behind helmets and shields, the federal parliament building, the state broadcasting center and police stations fell in quick succession.

Protesters tossed documents and portraits of Milosevic through the broken windows of the parliament complex. Smoke billowed from the building and from the state television headquarters nearby.

Elsewhere in the country, thousands more people joined smaller rallies in a number of towns.

"What we are doing today is making history," Kostunica said during an evening speech in front of Belgrade city hall, across from parliament.

There was no immediate response from Milosevic, and his whereabouts were not clear.

The domino-like successes of the opposition did not fully erase fears that Milosevic could still strike back. Kostunica asked supporters to remain on the streets until dawn to try to block any counterattack by the military. He also invited people from the countryside into Belgrade for rallies Friday.

"We call on the military and police to do everything to ensure a peaceful transition of power," he said.

The crowd chanted for Milosevic's arrest. Kostunica answered: "He doesn't need to be arrested. He arrested himself a long time ago."

At the White House, President Clinton said: "The people are trying to get their country back." British Prime Minister Tony Blair said of Milosevic: "Your time is up. Go now."

Group plans to register 1,000 voters for election

By CRISTINA JANNEY
Kansas State Collegian

A feminist group on campus plans to begin a voter registration drive with a goal of helping 1,000 Manhattan residents register to vote.

The effort of Ordinary Women will be non-partisan and other students are welcomed to join in the efforts, said Dory Nason, a co-founder of the group.

This election is symbolically important to female voters as this year is the 80th anniversary of the passage of the 19th Amendment, which guaranteed women the right to vote, Nason said.

Women have been coveted by both parties as potential swing votes and could play an important role in an election that seems to remain tight, Nason said.

Because this country is enjoying prosperity and no significant external threats face the nation, everyday issues like education, child care and health care have come to the forefront, she said.

ELECTIONS 2000

MORE INFO

People interested in joining Ordinary Women in their efforts can obtain more information on its Web site at ordinarywomen.angelfire.com/start.html

Where to register to vote
- Office of Student Activities and Services – Union ground floor
- County clerk's office – Riley County-100 Courthouse Plaza
- Any DMV
- Online – home advisor.msn.com/move/RegVoteIntro.asp
- Out-of-state – www.fec.gov/voteregis/vr.htm

Deadline to register – Oct. 23

Erin Downey, senior in English, said these issues should be concerns for all voters, but somehow they are labeled as women's concerns.

"We have a lot of influence over children's issues. We are associated with child welfare simply because we have to bear them," she said.

Abortion rights have come to the forefront of the campaign for women and men on both side of the issue. The next president could appoint several Supreme Court judges. If those judges were primarily conservative, it is the concern of pro-choice advocates that Roe v. Wade, the landmark abortion case, could be overturned.

Vice President Al Gore, in his debate remarks Tuesday night, said he would appoint the kind of judges to the Supreme Court who would uphold Roe v. Wade. Bush, who is pro-life, said judges' competence would be his priority in appointment.

Sarah Craig, junior in English, said she was concerned about the number of judges the next president might appoint.

"That gives the president a lot of power and long-lasting power," she said. "Women need someone who will support them. We need someone who will respect our rights.

"Voting is a very concrete way of giving women a voice."

Nason said they plan to distribute voter registration

Roberts hopes Kansas avoids environmental suit

TOPEKA — U.S. Sen. Pat Roberts doesn't like talk by two environmental groups about filing a federal lawsuit over water quality standards for Kansas.

Roberts said Thursday that he believes state officials and the Environmental Protection Agency can work out differences over standards proposed by the federal agency.

The senator said a lawsuit would make finding a compromise more difficult.

Critics, including state officials and agriculture groups, maintain the EPA standards would be too burdensome, require too much paperwork and force local communities to spend millions of dollars. The EPA has portrayed the cost of its proposed standards as minimal.

The Sierra Club and the Kansas Natural Resource Council notified the EPA on Wednesday they plan to file a lawsuit if the EPA does not put its proposed standards into effect by Dec. 3. The groups contend the standards should have taken effect Sunday under the 1972 federal Clean Water Act.

The EPA is taking public comments until Oct. 16, and both EPA and state officials say federal officials need time to review those comments.

Roberts said the debate over the water quality standards is in danger of becoming an all-or-nothing discussion.

"We've got a sheep and cattle war here, or the Hatfields and McCoys," Roberts said in a telephone interview from his Washington, D.C., office.

The new standards address what EPA sees as deficiencies in state standards on designating rivers and lakes for different uses, streams with low flows, stream beds where waste discharges create the only flow and limitations on a certain pollutant.

The standards also would require the state to regulate water quality in private lakes and ponds, including farm ponds.

6th graders arrested for alleged threat to teachers

KNOB NOSTER, Mo. — The police chief of this town in the shadow of Whiteman Air Force Base says the arrests of two sixth-graders brings a sigh of relief after suspicions the boys were planning to kill their teachers.

The Johnson County Juvenile Office filed a petition Wednesday alleging the students, both 12, conspired to commit first-degree murder. The boys face a detention hearing Friday.

Authorities have refused to detail the boys' alleged plans, except to say that teachers were targeted.

The boys, whose names were not released, were arrested Tuesday morning just before entering class at Knob Noster Middle School. One of the boys was carrying a knife, officials said.

"It's a nice, quiet town, and (people) want to get back to what was going on here before," Police Chief Brian Kniskern said. "There is some shock because someone that young could have thought this up."

Principal Pete Greene said Thursday that school officials were trying to keep everything as normal as possible.

Other students have been implicated in the plot, but have not been charged, Kniskern said. Some of them have been told not to attend school as the investigation continues.

Greene said the other students would be dealt with individually, but he would not elaborate.

Authorities would not say if more charges were expected.

The plot was uncovered after a student relayed a rumor to a parent, who called school officials. Police were called Monday evening.

"The whole thing came to light through parents and students," Greene said. "They are the ones that are the heroes. Without that communication, things wouldn't have worked as positively as they did, so we owe it to the parents and the students."

Microsoft seeks further time to prepare appeal

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Microsoft Corp. accused the government Thursday of trying to short-circuit the appellate process as the company sought more time to appeal a federal judge's order breaking up the software giant.

Microsoft asked the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit for four months to prepare its case. That is substantially more time than the Justice Department requested.

The Clinton administration early this week pressed for an expedited appeals process, saying there was a compelling public interest to wrapping up the antitrust dispute.

Microsoft responded Thursday by saying that in a case of this size, "if there is no threat of irreparable harm — and none has been shown here — the 'compelling public interest' is in a proper disposition of the case, not in one reached in haste."

The company said the 19 issues it plans to appeal and the many technological details of the case warrant a court schedule far longer than federal appellate guidelines.

The Justice Department's antitrust division proposed that all briefs be submitted by Dec. 22, followed by an oral argument to be set for January.

In its initial filing Monday, Microsoft attacked nearly every part of U.S. District Court Judge Thomas Penfield Jackson's ruling, even citing his comments to a newspaper that almost everything he did would be subject to appeal.

"It is truly remarkable that appellees now seek to shift to Microsoft the blame for, and the burden of, the delay that resulted from their tactical decision to seek direct review in the Supreme Court," the company's lawyers wrote.

Debate team gains skills, knowledge from contests

By MAGGIE BLUNK
Kansas State Collegian

Members of the K-State debate team gain knowledge of geography, perspectives and general facts as they compete around the nation.

Susan Stanfield, director of debate, said it's hard to say how the team will rank this year after finishing 7th last year.

"I hope to have as successful or more successful team as last year," she said. "I think we have the potential to finish in the top 10."

Michael Schultz, sophomore in speech, said he looks forward to traveling as part of the debate team. He said some of the places that the team travels include Texas, Iowa, Georgia, Louisiana and Kentucky.

"I also look forward to doing well in the tournaments," he said.

The team won the Johnson County tournament a few weekends ago competing against 30 teams, and placed 4th at Kentucky last weekend competing against 120 teams.

"The benefits of traveling is for the younger students to be able to watch more experienced debaters," Stanfield said.

"Debate causes you to think outside of the box. I enjoy competing toe-to-toe with the best teams in the nation."
–Alex Garrett, debate team member

The debate team competes in tournaments, generally three days long and organized over the weekend, from September to the end of March.

Kyle Wilson, junior in chemical engineering, said he received a scholarship to debate, which is similar to an academic scholarship. He said there is also a class for debate but it is not required.

"It's like a club, but we are required to research and attend a certain amount of tournaments," he said.

Most of the 12 active traveling debaters were on their high school debate teams and enjoyed the activity well enough to stick with it during college.

"I am really in it for the learning rather than the winning," Wilson said. "What time I do devote, I really just hope to learn."

Alex Garrett, sophomore in political science and winner of the National Junior Division Debate last year, said it takes a lot of practice and the expertise of the coaching staff to be successful.

"Debate causes you to think outside of the box," he said. "I enjoy competing toe-to-toe with the best teams in the nation."

Schultz said his involvement with the team is an ongoing process, with research during his free time and before competitions helping him and his teammates feel prepared.

"I've learned a lot and it helps me understand a lot of current events I probably wouldn't know about," he said.

Wilson also said he agrees that he has learned new perspectives on issues. After an argument is explained to him, it helps him make judgments on his beliefs.

"It's helped me establish what I need to know to make up my mind on issues," he said. "It's interesting because I'll hear arguments I've never heard before. I've learned a lot from other people."

VOTE

cards in Aggieville this weekend and next.

Helping motivate students to vote could help create a continuing pattern of voting, Nason said.

This is Downey's first opportunity to vote in a presidential election. She said she is excited.

"I finally get to participate in the democratic process. This is what I think is important," she said. "Americans are about to be able to stand up and say, 'this is important to me. Listen.'"

They plan to take cards to the Women's Crisis Center and will target neighborhoods in areas with low voter registration and turnout rates. For these neighborhoods, the students also plan to provide advance voting forms so people who are unable to go to the poles could request ballots be sent to them via mail.

In addition to the group's voter registration work, it also has plans to help remind and motivate students to vote.

They are asking other student groups on campus to create and post posters highlighting a campaign issue and why it might be important to their group and other students. The students also planned a chalking effort on campus to remind students of campaign issues.

"Hopefully, if we can get enough people in this country, including women, to have faith in voting," Nason said, "real change can happen."

6 club allocations bills introduced before Senate

By BRYAN SCRIBNER
Kansas State Collegian

Six allocation bills were introduced at Thursday's Student Senate meeting.

An allocation proposal of $2,690 for K-State Creative Arts Therapies, a new campus organization, was among the bills. Arts and Sciences Sen. Jill Szynskie said the group has 54 members and represents various fine-art forms.

"They're just getting their feet wet," Szynskie said.

The adoption of a women's softball sports club organization allocation of $1,326 was also introduced. Business Sen. Ben Harder said funding for sports clubs is important.

"They don't really have any other big source of funding," he said. "They have to pay their national dues to be a sports club."

The Muslim Student Association, Individuals for Freethought and KSU Aikido Club also had allocation bills introduced. All of the bills will be referred to the Allocations Committee.

Legislation regarding the student activities center was not introduced at this week's meeting.

enhancements or to service new buildings. Also, if a university needed extra money, the university could request support for these costs that are not covered by tuition ownership.

The final portion of this proposed bill is an increase in university flexibility. The board would look at ways to streamline the administrative process for the universities.

"This whole package is something that will be very beneficial to K-State as we enter the 21st century," Rawson said. "It will provide us with the ability to address our own unique needs at K-State."

The board will vote whether to recommend this proposal to the Gov. Bill Graves on Oct. 18-19 in Emporia.

REVOLUTION

Opposition leader Zoran Djindjic said Milosevic was holed up in the eastern town Bor, some 50 miles southeast of the capital, and that he had not been in touch with Kostunica's camp. But there were also rumors that Milosevic had left Serbia in a plane.

Commenting on that possibility, National Security Adviser Sandy Berger said: "There are a lot of rumors swirling around and I would take them all with a certain grain of salt at this point. Again, we have no reason at this stage to believe that he's not still in Serbia."

Later in the evening, during an interview on state television, Kostunica said he envisions a democratic Serbia that has normal relations with other countries and does not suffer under diplomatic sanctions.

The United States and the European Union have imposed sanctions against the Milosevic regime for several years. But French Foreign Minister Hubert Vedrine said France, which holds the rotating EU presidency, is "taking the necessary steps" for the EU to reconsider the sanctions as soon as Monday.

In Belgrade, clashes spread through the capital, which echoed with the sound of stun grenades and tear gas fired to break up the crowds. Later, both state television channels went off the air before coming back on under opposition control, and the state-run Tanjug news agency — one of chief pillars of Milosevic's rule — announced it is no longer loyal to him.

The conquest of the parliament was highly symbolic, but the loss of the state media and the government-run newspaper Politika was a bigger blow to Milosevic, denying him his biggest propaganda tools.

During the evening TV interview, Kostunica said that from now on, state television will be open to a variety of different viewpoints.

"It must be a mirror of all the people's sensibilities," he said.

A statement from Milosevic's Socialist Party of Serbia said it would fight against violence and destruction with all its force and in all state institutions, Tanjug reported.

The Yugoslav military remained in its barracks and it was unclear whether the army remained loyal to Milosevic, but his security forces appeared to be disintegrating, with protesters seizing police precincts without a fight. The level of defiance was unprecedented in Yugoslavia's 55-year communist history.

City abounds with cultural opportunities

If you don't want to cough up the $40 to see K-State crush the University of Kansas this weekend in Lawrence, there are things to do right here in Manhattan.

These things fall under the category of inexpensive live art.

Just this weekend, the university will present "Two Gentlemen of Verona," a comedy by William Shakespeare. For $6, students can see the interesting sets, costumes and talent from K-State.

For $8.50, students can take in community theater with "The Best Man" this weekend at the Manhattan Arts Center.

The Mark Morris Dance Group is working with K-State students to present a live performance in McCain. Students can see this for only $16 or $14, depending on their seats.

Every weekend there is something different going on in Manhattan. There always is a wide variety of opportunities for students to take part in, and the more students support these, the more variety there will be in the future.

The prices aren't too bad, either — at least these theaters offer student discounts, unlike some other forms of entertainment in Manhattan.

This is a chance for students to indulge in live entertainment and experience various cultural events without leaving Manhattan.

WASTE OF SPACE

Construction of new activities center useless for most students

Student Body President Jake Worcester wants to build a $4.8 million waste of space on the east side of the K-State Student Union.

He, of course, won't refer to it as a waste of space. He heralds it as a student activities center, a place where members of various student organizations will be able to come together to exchange ideas.

JOSEPH HURLA

But this utopia for K-State organizations will never exist.

And the building should never exist.

The reason students should oppose the construction of this building is easy to understand. It will cost each student about $50 and offer them little to nothing in return.

Worcester presented the Privilege Fee Committee with a potential solution to funding problems the center has encountered. His solution includes a privilege fee of $6.50 per student per semester for 12 years.

Granted, few of us will be here for 12 years. But $13 per year for four years is $52.

When I write my check each semester to K-State, I already am being bled dry. I pay for the library. I pay for the Chester E. Peters Recreational Complex. I pay for Lafene Health Center. These each provide a service that, if I choose to use them, will be of great benefit to me.

The student activities center, however, offers me nothing in return.

I never will use the building. In fact, only a small percentage of K-State students actually ever will use the addition.

But Worcester does not want us to talk about that. He wants us to talk about how interaction that occurs in the building will be vital to communication on campus. He wants us to talk about the unity it will create.

But who will it unify?

The four primary organizations that have been proposed to occupy the center are Student Governing Association, Greek Affairs, multicultural organizations and Union Program Council.

Greek Affairs, however, wants no part of it.

Barb Robel, adviser for greek affairs, has said that, while she thinks the center is an interesting concept, she would just as soon pass on the offer.

The addition, in fact, would be nothing more than a cubicle farm.

Each organization that applies, or at least the 120 that are chosen, would be assigned a cubicle. As anyone who has worked in a cubicle will attest, nothing has such a glorious effect on communication as cubicles — except having your lips cut off.

Cubicles will not improve communication. It will cram more than 100 organizations into cramped quarters where the only communication they will share will be about their discomfort.

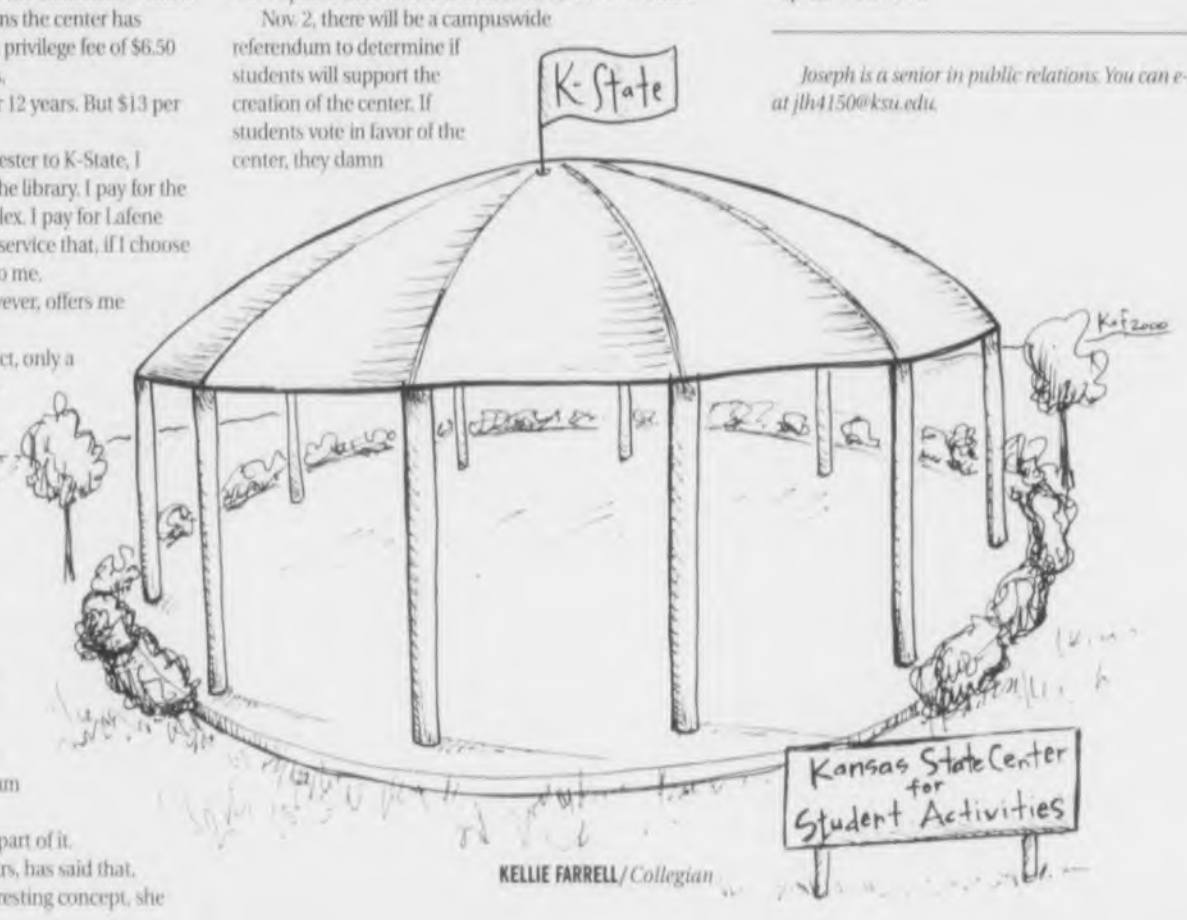
But most of us will not have to share in that discomfort.

Most of us simply will pay our $50 and let others endure it.

Unless, of course, we tell Worcester we don't want to shell out 50 plus bones to create a three-floor sea of cubicles.

Nov. 2, there will be a campuswide referendum to determine if students will support the creation of the center. If students vote in favor of the center, they damn themselves and students for 12 years to come to an additional fee that advances campus life in absolutely no way.

If they vote no, they save themselves and future students money — and the pain of an additional construction project.



Worcester said he fears students who graduate soon — and who won't be around to see the benefits of the center — will vote against its construction.

I graduate in December. Not only will I not be around to see the so-called benefits of the center, I won't be around to pay any of its costs, either.

I am not trying to save myself some money at the expense of future students.

I am trying to save future students some money at the expense of no one.

Cancer, fighting for cures important after experience

Once there was a time when the word 'cancer' had no meaning in my life.

That was a time when my life revolved around Cabbage Patch Kids and Koosh balls. Back then, life centered around Masters of the Universe and G.I. Joe.

ERIN SCHNEWEIS

It was an era when Michael Jackson, Tiffany and Debbie Gibson were as big as the stars in the sky, and when macaroni and cheese was a gourmet meal.

It was a time when the worst thing that happened was that my three older brothers beheaded my Barbie doll and stuffed her head into her pink plastic toilet.

Then my eyes opened, and my world seemed to fall apart. From then on there could be no backtracking to the days when everything was wonderful.

Misery and tragedy entered into my magical world of innocence.

It was the day my mom told me my aunt had breast cancer.

At the time I didn't know what cancer meant. As the tears trickled down her face I knew that it wasn't good.

It was like a snake bite with venom spreading at various rates. Back then it almost was certain that cancer was a death trap; a pit full of lions which had not eaten in days.

For over a decade, my aunt struggled and fought the battle that never seemed to end. Her world was filled with needles and pain as the venomous cancer spread over her body.

In July 1999, I watched as my family members were pallbearers at her funeral.

The fight was over. The day-to-day struggle with medications and physical pain finally had came to an end.

It is true the sun rose the next day, but it didn't seem to shine as bright. The world continued to go on, just a little slower.

Now my grandmother, whose sweetness one cannot capture with words, is fighting the battle. Waging the war against time. Struggling to surpass the internal bleeding that has made her physically weak.

On Tuesday, the doctor gave her two months to live.

Granted, two months is just a number to put on the circumstances, but it is a number that seems so small.

If two months is right, that would only be 60 more sunrises and 60 more sunsets. Only 60 more times to kiss my grandfather good morning and 60 more times to kiss him good night.

My grandfather is battling cancer as well. He is struggling to hold on. Over and over we hear how his days are limited, too.

This summer, my best friend's mother faced the struggle of breast cancer. She always was positive and upbeat around everyone, but there had to be times when tears were the replacement for her beautiful smile, moments when life just didn't seem to be fair, moments of feeling alone.

She wasn't alone.

Everyone knows someone who has, had or will have cancer.

There are so many different types: bladder, breast, cervical, esophageal, kidney, leukemia, liver, lung, prostate, stomach, thyroid, ovarian ... and the list goes on.

Early detection is essential, but even that doesn't necessarily mean security.

Cancer still is the snake.

Venom still is venom.

I am confident that someday there will be a cure. Someday, I hope the word "cancer" will be as threatening as the word "influenza."

There will come a time when victims will not have to continuously aim to be survivors.

Until then, what can we do?

Attempt to do the little things that can add up to big things.

For over two years, I have been growing my hair out to donate to Locks of Love. It is a non-profit organization that provides hair prosthetics for children who have developed long-term medical hair loss. If you would like more information about this Florida-based group, call (888) 896-1588 or go to the Web site www.locksoflove.org/.

Strive to do what you can.

Attend benefits and functions that help organizations who are raising money to aid cancer research. Vote for political candidates who stress the importance of fighting these tragedies. Make a point to encourage those who are currently battling this hardship.

Just don't sit around and wait for magic to happen.

Someday it will happen — in the form of medicine and vaccinations.

Until then, cancer will have to continue to be the venom of the snake that won't stop biting.

Martyred boy demonstrates injustices present in world

The world was shocked a few days ago when the pictures of a young Palestinian boy being shot to death with his father next to him were projected on our TV screens. The level of violence in Jerusalem reached an all-time high. What did that boy do? What did his father do? For what crime was he shot dead? Maybe his crime was that he was first a boy, and second a Palestinian Muslim. Right? This is why he was shot by heavily-armed Zionist Israeli soldiers. His father, as shown in several clips, kept screaming: "Do not shoot, do not shoot!" (visit news.bbc.co.uk/hi/english/world/middle_east newsid_952000/952700.stm). Yet this is exactly what the Israeli forces did, shoot to kill. They probably felt like being on a special training mission with five targets, certainly.

KHALID KEBBATI

Where is justice? Where is justice?

The United States. claims to be the world's leader, to have a military might, to have the best trained soldiers in the world. Of course, Great Britain, France, Russia and China claim the same things. They are the five masters of the United Nations. What did they do for that little boy? Nothing. In fact, it is U.S. taxpayers' money that helps feed the violence. You might wonder how. Simple. Every year the state of Israel receives more than $10 billion in economic and military aid from the United States. The bullets that perforated the Palestinian boy's body were paid by American tax payers' money, your money and mine. It is the truth, it's enough to dig in the third floor of Hale Library in the government documents to find out how much goes to Israel to support its state sponsored terrorist activities, such as the bulldozing of Palestinian houses, and expropriation of Palestinian land.

What happened to the Collegian? No coverage of the issue. Why? Are we to remain silent to injustice? We must stand firm for justice on earth — everywhere — not only in our backyard, but everywhere. In the sight of Allah (God), we all are created equal. It does not matter whether the people who are suffering are blacks or whites, males or females, Christians, Muslims, Jews or Buddhists, far from the United States or next door to it. We must stand and voice our opinion to the decisionmakers who we, the people, have chosen to represent us. How did the Vietnam War end? Because there were men and women who stood for the truth and for justice on earth. Don't you remember? A great number of these men and women happened to be college students, professors, and educated people who said enough was enough and no more aggression.

The problem that we all have is that we feel comfortable and cozy in this life. We have money, a degree to seek, a job, a nice home, vacation time, and any luxury of life can be accessed by the touch of a button, i.e. electronic

Predictions fly from both sides of state

Jayhawks to be annihilated by Cats, lose rest of season

DEREK BOSS

"Rivalry" is often the first term that comes to mind when thinking of a grueling Sunflower Showdown between K-State and the University of Kansas. At least it used to be.

In fact, this Saturday's football game in Lawrence is far from it. Break out the feather pillows and a good book (for those Jayhawks who can read) — this weekend's gonna be a snoozer.

Keep in mind, it's not the fourth-ranked Wildcats' fault there won't be a worthwhile game to watch. KU really is just that bad.

So far, the Hawks' season is highlighted by a 42-0 win over Div. 1-AA Southern Illinois and a 23-20 squeaker over Alabama-Birmingham (a real title contender), while losing their opener by two touchdowns to SMU and getting downed 34-16 by Oklahoma last weekend. Rock chalk Jayhawks, baby — that's an impressive start.

Now, I already can hear the rebuttal from the crimson and blue. "K-State has the weakest non-conference schedule in college football," they claim. And maybe there is some truth in that assertion. I'll admit Iowa, Louisiana Tech, Ball State and North Texas are far from college football powerhouses, but at least we can win the weaker games on our schedule, unlike the boys down Interstate 70.

Plus, look at some of the other teams around the nation that play some of the same four schools as the Cats in their non-conference schedules. Iowa, of the prestigious Big Ten Conference, faced Big 12 schools Nebraska and Iowa State this year; Louisiana Tech has Penn State, Auburn, and Miami (Fla.) on its schedule; Ball State nearly knocked off Florida in their season opener and North Texas nearly topped Baylor and Texas Tech.

Not bad. But regardless, just looking at K-State's win last weekend should silence critics. The Wildcats went into Colorado's house, the legendary Folsom Field, and dominated the Buffaloes 44-21. Enough said.

What was that? Did I just hear somebody in Lawrence try to downplay that victory, too? No, I didn't personally hear anything, but I'm willing to bet somebody over there right now is saying, "Man, Colorado hasn't won a game yet."

Granted, the Buffaloes are 0-4, but three of those losses came to top 10 opponents, namely USC, Washington and K-State. It's unfair to judge a program's record with such a difficult schedule to open the season. Besides, I'll put down money that come Oct. 21, the Jayhawks will be crying when they get stomped by the Buffs.

In fact, there'll be a whole lot of crying in Lawrence this season. After the city's precious Hawks get decimated by K-State for the eighth straight year this Saturday (I'm predicting something along the lines of 55-6), I'm willing to bet that KU doesn't win a game the rest of the season.

Just look at their schedule.

@Missouri — The Tigers gave Nebraska a scare last weekend, so a win over the Hawks on their home field won't be much of a problem.

Colorado — As I already said, Buffs win big.

Texas Tech — Possibly KU's best chance at a win, since the Red Raiders didn't look too impressive against Texas A&M in their last outing, but Tech should prevail in a tight ball game.

@Nebraska — Not many win at Memorial Stadium, and the Hawks will be no exception. They shouldn't even expect to score on the Big Red.

Texas — KU will have a Major problem, and his name is Applewhite.

@Iowa State — The Cyclones are playing some of their best football in years, as they started the 2000 season with a 4-0 record. They'll get their first loss this weekend versus Nebraska, but their regular season finale with the Hawks should determine if they get a bowl berth or not. In other words, put your money on ISU.

So there you have it, KU fans, (I'll pause and give you a moment to grab a Kleenex — I know it must be hard to face the truth) your season is basically over.

But at any rate, there is one single element of interest in this weekend's ball game. I'm curious to see if the Hawks really do bleed crimson and blue.

Never mind. I guess I could just ask Zac Wegner.

KU columnist ponders team history, predicts upset

SHAWN LINENBERGER

The Sunflower Showdown is here and so are unfamiliar faces in the Collegian and Kansan with the yearly "column swapping."

Too many columnists before me have reached into the bag of Jayhawk and Wildcat stereotypes to dog the opposing school, but I'll try not to travel down that beaten path.

With that in mind, you won't see any Silo Tech versus Snob Hill, or Wranglers against Abercrombie and Fitch.

K-State fans also won't be reminded to purchase tickets for next summer's Inbreed Stampede, er, Country Stampede near Manhattan. I won't even tell Wildcat fans that chewing tobacco in Memorial Stadium is frowned upon. That goes for you, too, cheerleaders.

Instead, why not write about the obvious — football.

Once again, the Wildcats are potential national-title game participants, while the Jayhawks aren't. But before K-State fans assume another easy victory and make a toast with some Natural Light, perhaps they should pay attention.

Kansas went to Oklahoma last weekend and should have defeated the Sooners, but continuous turnovers didn't help the Jayhawks' cause. Oklahoma joined K-State in the top 10 on Sunday and could end up in the Big 12 Conference title game against Nebraska.

The Jayhawks also played better on the road, a place that hasn't been kind to the Hawks lately. Memorial Stadium has been, and that happens to be the venue for Saturday's Sunflower Showdown.

Yes, K-State has owned Kansas the last few years, but they sure don't have the stranglehold Nebraska has enjoyed for pretty much 30 years on both the Hawks and the Cats.

And let's not forget the past.

Many Wildcats who have proclaimed they bled purple in the fall seasons during the 80s probably don't even remember Wildcat quarterback Jason Smargiasso spending most of the 1992 Sunflower Showdown on his back. Kansas won 31-7, and K-State registered negative yards rushing.

The past is just that, but it's reassuring to know that Kansas still leads the series 61-31-5. Well, somewhat reassuring. Losing seven straight to K-State isn't such a grand feeling, especially when K-State's bandwagon gained a large number of passengers. K-State's slogan is, "Everyone a Wildcat." Well, hell, when K-State is playing well, of course everybody's gonna be a Wildcat. The life of a K-State football fan is pretty much fair weather, especially in January. I wonder how many K-State fans still have "I'm a Stan Fan" buttons for Bill Snyder's predecessor, Stan Parrish. Yeah, that's what I thought. Most K-State fans didn't know college football existed until 1993.

Most Wildcat players and fans probably don't consider the Jayhawks rivals right now, but beating Nebraska once at Manhattan two years ago doesn't really constitute a rivalry, either. K-State beating Nebraska was great for Wildcat fans, but for now, K-State should label Nebraska as its most-hated opponent.

But back to Wildcats and Jayhawks, here's your rundown for Saturday's game: K-State breezed through their schedule thus far, and what team wouldn't? The Jayhawks haven't. Advantage: K-State.

The Wildcats haven't lost to Kansas since Papa Bush was president. Advantage: K-State.

The game is at Memorial Stadium, not the stadium next to the mistake known as Bramlage Coliseum. Advantage: Kansas.

The Jayhawks have played a top 15 team; the Wildcats tussled with No. 112. Advantage: Kansas.

When the smoke clears, the winner will be Kansas, 31-17. There you have it. And just think, all you Wildcat fans making the trip to Lawrence this weekend will get a great chance to do some shopping at Abercrombie and Fitch.

Sunflower Showdown showcases intrastate strife

Parking at Memorial Stadium

SARA MARTIN/Collegian

K-State fans will have three parking options this Saturday for the K-State/KU football game in Lawrence.
1. Parking Garage – Located on Mississippi Street across from the stadium.
Cost: $10
Tailgating is permitted, but no grilling will be allowed in the parking garage.
2. Lot 39 – Located just south of the stadium off Memorial Drive.
Cost: $5
Nice place to tailgate, as lot overlooks stadium.
3. Lot 50 – Located just west of the stadium off Memorial Drive.
Cost: $5
Grilling and tailgating are permitted in lot areas.

Other note: According to the KU Athletic Promotions Office, there are about 3,500 tickets remaining for the general public for Saturday's ballgame.

Allen likely to return

Senior tailback David Allen's return is likely for Saturday's contest with KU. However, head coach Bill Snyder said that when Allen does see action this season, it remains to be seen whether he'll see significant playing time or if he'll be eased into the lineup.

"That is a decision not available at this point in time, we just haven't made it in that regard," Snyder said. "It's just a matter of what I'm told by our medical people and by David. It'll depend on how he feels and how they feel about what he's capable of doing and what he's not."

If there's any less of a rivalry in Saturday's 98th renewal of the Sunflower State Showdown, the Wildcat players don't seem to notice.

"It hasn't died or anything like that, I don't think," senior linebacker Jason Kazar said. "I'm always up for KU 'cause it's in-state and you always want those bragging rights cause you've got friends that go to that school.

"I don't think it's one-sided. Anything could happen. You can't look at the past. I think it's still special because it is a rivalry."

However, it's hard to look past K-State's seven consecutive victories over the University of Kansas, dating back to 1993, when the Wildcats travel to Lawrence this weekend.

No. 4 K-State (5-0, 1-0) and the Jayhawks (2-2, 0-1) will battle for the Governor's Cup at 1 p.m. at Memorial Stadium.

Yet, head coach Bill Snyder said neither records nor the Cats' winning streak over the Hawks should overshadow Saturday's ball game.

"I certainly recognize the fact that it's an extremely meaningful football game to everyone," Snyder said, "and I understand how the people of the state of Kansas, regardless of whether you're a K-Stater or a University of Kansas individual, think it's become extremely important."

That significance renders an elevated level of excitement for fans across the state.

"People get enthused and excited about this ball game, and I appreciate that a great deal," Snyder said. "I think our players do, because it is that in-state rivalry that exists, and as coaches, I respect that and I identify with it. To me, it is the next game, but that does not by any stretch of the imagination make it any less important to us."

Not to mention, K-State players said the atmosphere at Memorial Stadium should provide extra motivation for the Cats to beat their Interstate 70 rivals.

"I know it's going to be packed," Kazar said, "and there will be a lot of people there cheering us on and cheering them on, so it's going to be pretty loud, I bet. I'm just excited to get there and play.

"Hopefully, if our fans get down there, they'll be battling each other in the stands and not get on us. So it'll be like a little rivalry in the stands, so we won't have to worry about them. But I'm sure they'll be on us."

K-State's Quincy Morgan hauls in a 46-yard pass during last year's game against the KU Jayhawks in Manhattan. Morgan had five catches for 192 yards and two touchdowns in the Wildcats' 50-9 win last year.

Yet, junior offensive lineman John Robertson said the rival's opposing crowd is often the driving force behind his play on the road.

"It actually fires me up a little bit, like a traditional college football rivalry," he said. "So, I personally like it when you go into a rival's stadium and the fans hate your guts. It just fires you up and makes you want to play harder."

That feeling of an in-state rivalry is even evident in Wildcat players from outside the state of Kansas, including Vermillion, S.D., native Ben Leber.

"The last couple years it's increased in a rivalry for me," the junior linebacker said. "This is my fourth year down here, so it's kind of become my new home. I can feel the tension, I can feel the rivalry starting, and it's just as much a rivalry for me as anybody else from Kansas."

Regardless of the emotions connected with Saturday's ball game, Snyder said head coach Terry Allen and the Hawks have the tools to give the Cats a difficult afternoon of football.

"I think they're a capable football team that is just beginning to gain some confidence and come into their own," Snyder said, "and I think they could allow us to have our hands full — I don't have any doubt about that."

Beasley's statistics ahead of Bishop's

■ 5th-year senior racks up high numbers in 1st 5 games of 2000 season, attracts notice.

By MICHAEL NOLL

FILE PHOTO BY KELLY GLASSCOCK/Collegian

Jonathan Beasley throws the ball during the game against Ball State on Sept. 16. Beasley has accquired 1,316 all purpose yards and 17 touchtown throws in the first five games of the season.

When Michael Bishop graduated two years ago as K-State's highest Heisman finisher ever, it was inevitable that the same lofty standards would be maintained for his successor, Jonathan Beasley.

And even early in this, Beasley's second season as a starter, those comparisons had been unfavorable.

However, after five games, Beasley's statistics actually are better than Bishop's were at the same point in his senior year.

To wit, Beasley has amassed 1,316 all-purpose yards and 17 touchdowns. Bishop, after five games, had compiled 1,215 yards and 14 touchdowns. Beasley's 61.5 passing percentage is also 7.5 points higher than Bishop's.

So is Beasley better than the current New England Patriots' third-string quarterback, especially now that ESPN's Gene Wojciechowski is listing the K-State signal-caller as a conditional Heisman nominee?

"Nope," Beasley said, shaking his head emphatically.

He might not be as talented as Bishop, but the comparisons still are unfair and a Heisman consideration is not without merit, wide-out Martez Wesley said.

"He's taken a lot of criticism since he's been here," he said. "I really feel because of the things he does for this team that it kind of puts him in that type of role."

The main reason Beasley finally is garnering praise in his fifth year at K-State, offensive coordinator Ron Hudson said, is his knowledge of the offense, as opposed to Bishop's sheer athletic ability.

"Michael has a little bit more athletic presence about himself — the speed factor and how well he can run," Hudson said. "Jonathan will get us into the right schemes. He has a little bit more of an understanding of the offense and what we're trying to do."

Not that Beasley isn't athletic. While he can match Bishop's throwing velocity, he also knows when to take a little bit off the pass, wide-out Brandon Clark said.

"He knows when to throw it hard," Clark said. "Sometimes when he's rushed, he throws the ball a little harder than he should sometimes, but he's a great touch passer. He knows the easiest passes to catch."

That improved accuracy has been quite evident this season, Hudson said, and as a result, gives the Cats a chance to win games.

"I think he's doing a better job with the short throwing game, which he didn't do a year ago, and the deep ball has been on the money," Hudson said. "What he's not doing is he's not throwing the interceptions. He's making some pretty good decisions, and he's pretty accurate. If you have that out of a quarterback, you have a chance."

Sometimes, though, Beasley just gets lucky, Hudson said. Against Colorado, for example, the senior QB completed a pass to Wesley that could have just as easily been caught by a Buffaloes' defensive back.

"He took a big chance," Hudson said. "He's trying to make some plays, and he made them, but whether he's able to do that consistently, we're going to find out."

Beasley, however, just puts his mistakes in the past and keeps playing.

"I'm playing pretty good. I've made some mistakes with some bad pitches and the interceptions at Iowa, but I'm playing better than in the past," Beasley said.

The credit for that improvement, however, falls to the entire team. Without his supporting cast, Beasley said his performances would be meaningless.

"Without the offensive line blocking, the receivers running routes, and the backs blocking and catching the ball, I wouldn't be here right now," Beasley said. "Without those guys, there's no real need for me to be talking right now."

Brothers prepare to face each other on Saturday

By DAN SMITH
Kansas State Collegian

Cliff Holloman remembers playing football a long time ago.

Long before his decision to don the purple and white for K-State on Saturdays, one that came just a year prior to brother Ervin choosing the crimson and blue of the University of Kansas, Cliff reminisces the lively games played among the furniture in the Holloman home.

"We played a lot in the living room, and we got in trouble for it," said the 6-foot-4, 275-pound senior defensive tackle. "My mom didn't like it, but we still played."

After a successful 31-sack senior year at Wichita Northwest High School and no significant living room injuries, Cliff decided to take the Holloman game to Garden City Community College. Ervin would join him one short year later.

Cliff became a two-year starter as a Broncbuster before continuing his success in 1999 with K-State, helping to anchor the defensive line for the Wildcats with 37 total tackles a year ago.

Cliff had grown accustomed to his closeness with Ervin, also a defensive end, but said he respected his brother's decision to become a Jayhawk instead of a Wildcat because of their relationship.

"He's real quiet, but we're close like glue," the elder Holloman said. "I let him make his own decision, and it was fine."

Sibling rivalry, however, definitely will play a part in the way the brothers play in Lawrence on Saturday, K-State's defensive ends coach Bob Fello said.

"I would think that would enter into it," Fello said of the family feud. "You talk about bragging rights in your state, this is going a little closer. I mean, who gets first shot at the bathroom if you do win, I think they'll go at it pretty hard."

Fello also has ties to KU as the Jayhawks' defensive coordinator under Glen Mason from 1991 to 1994, helping KU to a 23-10 Aloha Bowl win in 1992.

K-State's defensive coordinator Phil Bennett agreed with Fello's statement, but knows that after the game there will be much to celebrate for the Holloman family.

"It's like fighting your brother, you always want to win," Bennett said of Cliff's attitude. "All of us want to beat our competitors, but all of us have great feelings after the game."

Cliff Holloman

Head coach Bill Snyder said the inter-family competition will bring out the best in both of the players' performances.

"I would think there is some emotion involved there on both sides. They're both good young people," Snyder said. "I think they will be competitive for the right reasons and also there will be a competitive side to them that relates to them being brothers and competing against each other."

Snyder also said he sees other similar characteristics in the Holloman brothers in addition to their last names.

"There are some similarities I think. Both of them are guys that can manage in everything that's gap-responsibility oriented," Snyder said of the Holloman approach to defense. And the statistics tell the same story.

After five games this year, Cliff has recorded seven tackles and one sack for the Cats, while brother Ervin still is looking for his first shot at the QB after collecting 11 tackles in four games as a Jayhawk.

Regardless of the statistics, however, Bennett said he knows that both brothers will be playing for respect at KU's Memorial Stadium on Saturday.

"Cliff's a good worker, he chases the ball well, and I think Ervin has the same traits," Bennett said. "I think that Cliff is excited about this game and he's going to be ready to go."

Play's focus appropriate for current elections

By DAVID LAUNDER
Kansas State Collegian

Mudslinging, scandals and tension are familiar words this time of year.

With elections just around the corner, all eyes are focused squarely on the campaigns.

One election that exhibits all the these qualities, but will not affect the American public is the one that takes place in Gore Vidal's "The Best Man."

Even though this play was first produced on Broadway in 1960, Tish Rogers, executive director of the Manhattan Arts Center, said it has not gone out of date.

"This play is timeless," Rogers said. "What people will discover is that things haven't changed much."

The play, which opened last week at the arts center, is focused on an election between two candidates, Russell and Cantwell, from an unnamed political party.

Russell, played by Charles Faulk, is considered the "good" candidate. He is honest, nice and wants what is best for the people.

Cantwell, played by Steve Chellew, is the candidate who is seen as more of a win-at-all-costs type of person.

A bitter competition arises between the two candidates involving all the smear tactics commonly associated with elections today.

Rogers said "The Best Man" made its first appearance under the direction of the late Manhattan resident Beverly Faw in fall 1968. Faw, who died last July, directed and acted in many plays during her 35 years in Manhattan. The cast is dedicating this performance of "The Best Man" to her memory.

One actor remains from the original cast that performed the play in 1968. Rix Shanline plays Art Hockstader, the former president of the United States.

Overall, director Patricia Weisenburger said she is pleased with the work of her cast.

"This is a great group of people to work with," she said. "They have a deep commitment to ensure the show will be successful."

Larry Marcellus, who plays Sheldon Marcus, has been active in Manhattan theater for more than 30 years. He said he shares Weisenburger's opinion about the cast.

"This is a really great cast," he said. "Everyone gets along very well."

Because of subject matter, Weisenburger said the play is probably geared more toward an older crowd.

"This is not something you would necessarily bring your kids to," she said.

Weisenburger said the timing for the play was perfect.

"You really can't have it any other time," she said. "It's really interesting to see the parallels between this and the current election."

Faulk said the play has been enjoyable for all of those involved.

"This has really been a fun and challenging play," he said.

Dance club offers hip-hop venue in Manhattan

By JJ DUNCAN
Kansas State Collegian

For the owners of Outer Limits, the club is more than a place to dance.

It is a dream come true, C.J. Wadsworth, co-owner of Outer Limits, said.

"I've been waiting for an opportunity like this to happen for a long time," he said.

Wadsworth, junior in sociology, is known to those who listen to him on the Urban Show on KSDB-FM 91.9 as "Big Daddy Bo Cephus."

He is also the house disc jockey for the club, which opened Sept. 27, and he said the thing he liked about the club the first time he saw it was how it reminded him of home.

"I'm from Syracuse, and it reminded me of the underground members-only clubs around there," he said. "It needed a lot of work, but I saw the potential, especially in an area without a strong hip-hop scene in the clubs."

Wadsworth became involved with Outer Limits after meeting with Jeff Hollywood, co-owner of the club. The two were looking for the same types of things in the business.

The main focus of the club is hip-hop, but Wadsworth said it is open to other things as well.

There will occasionally be live bands, as well as techno nights for those with a taste for late-night raves.

Though the club offers different types of entertainment on different nights, Hollywood said Outer Limits won't mix the types of music in one night, like other clubs. This club will have one type of music all night so people can more fully experience that genre.

"If we're playing hip-hop and urban on any night, we're playing that constantly without fluctuating," he said.

"Whatever the night is, we'll stay focused on the theme we're offering for that night, whether that's reggae or hip-hop or whatever."

Outer Limits offers a venue for hip-hop that Manhattan hasn't previously had, said Hank Byrd, junior in mass in communications.

MICHAEL YOUNG/Collegian

Jeff Hollywood, co-owner of the new club Outer Limits expects to offer Manhattan a venue for hip-hop that the town has not previously had.

The club could grow into something very strong, and people will enjoy it once they go there, he said.

"It's different from other clubs in Manhattan," he said. "It's got a definite hip-hop flavor, and that provides an outlet for music that might not otherwise get played."

Outer Limits is a work in progress with renovation going on constantly. It will keep looking better until it is completely finished, and for now all of the profit is going right back into the club, Wadsworth said.

"It's all cleaned up but we're doing a lot of remodeling," he said. "One thing that's going to be cool about this place for the first couple of months is that every time you come out there's going to be something different. It will look better every week."

Wadsworth said the experience has been nerve-racking, but he has learned from it.

"I'm the busiest I've ever been my entire life, with everything flying at me a million miles an hour," he said. "At the same time I'm having the most fun I've ever had because its great to say you own something that people want to come to."

Tuxedo choice proves important detail

By JJ DUNCAN
Kansas State Collegian

When an entire wedding party brought back the tuxedos they had rented drenched in water, Michelle Moore, assistant manager of Randall's Formal Wear, quickly placed them in a tank of water so they would stay wet.

"You have to keep them wet because if they dry, then they will shrink, and then they can't be salvaged," she said. "The wedding party must have jumped in a pool, because there was so much water we even poured it out of one of the shoes."

Fortunately, occurrences like this are kept to a minimum when people rent tuxedos for weddings, Moore said.

Usually most of the effort involved in her job is helping people make good fashion decisions. That still is an important element when the choices made affect one of the most important days of peoples' lives — their wedding day.

While tuxedos are only one element in an entire day of meticulously planned preparations and stress-inducing details, they still make a big difference, Moore said. That's because how the bride and groom look will be immortalized in numerous expensive wedding photos.

"You don't want to get a tux that you're going to look at 20 years from now in pictures and wonder why you even wore it," she said. "You want to get a tux that when you look back at 20 years later, you know that you looked really good that day."

Looking good is a must for most people when it comes to the big day. However, looking good can have many different meanings and is subject to personal taste.

That is why Shari Wine, sales clerk at Marie's Bridal, Formal Wear and Tuxedos, said she makes a difference when it comes to choosing a tuxedo.

Wine, sophomore in public relations, said when someone comes in looking for a tuxedo she guides them through the different styles and goes through books with them.

Some people need to find a certain color to match something the bride is wearing. Some people need to choose between a military style or a hip, modern look or just the simple, classic looks that Wine said she prefers.

"I like the simple, single-breasted tuxes," she said. "I don't really like the zoot suits or the fancy ones so much for a wedding because the simple ones never go out of style."

When shopping for the right tuxedo, not only is style an issue for concern, but so is making sure that the measurements are correct, said Linsey Dayhoff, employee of Swan's Tux Shoppe. Dayhoff, junior in marketing, said to make sure the sales clerk knows what they are doing when they make the measurements. Probe to see how much they really know.

"Ask the person who is helping you lots of questions," she said. "If they have been there for a while and they are giving you lots of information, then they probably know their business."

Getting into the stores early can be just as important as getting a tuxedo that looks good and fits well. If finding the right tuxedo is delayed too long, it can be harder to ensure that the groom will get the right one, Moore said.

Waiting longer also can cause high stress situations where people end up at each other's throats.

"We encourage people to come in early because it is a high anxiety situation when it gets closer to the wedding," she said. "Once everyone gets screaming at each other there can be a lot of pressure. All of that can be avoided if they just come in early enough."

If the groom comes in early to find a tux, mix-ups that occur due to people hurrying through the process can be avoided along with the stress, Wine said.

In one incident involving several pairs of pants, a man walked down the aisle in baggy pants after leaving the store with the wrong pair. A child's pair of tuxedo pants also were left at the shop, she said.

"In all the confusion, the guy ended up with the wrong pants and the kid's pants were left in the dressing room," she said. "We got the kid's pants out to the family just before they left for the chapel, but it was too late when the groom realized he had grabbed the pants that were too large."

Weddings are easily one of the most stressful situations that exist, which is why any step to avoid that stress should be taken, Wine said.

She said she does her best to make the tuxedo details run as smoothly as possible and that grooms should pay attention to the comfort of the tuxedo so they don't have to go through the exhausting process of the wedding in discomfort.

"My final words of advice would be when looking for a tux, find something you are comfortable in because you are going to go through a long day in it," she said.

KELLY GLASSCOCK/Collegian

Tuxedos are displayed in the store window of The Tux Shoppe. The store is one of several shops in Manhattan that carry a variety of men's formal wear. When shopping for tuxedos it is important to make notice of the different styles available.

Lecturer speaks on pay inequality

MICHAEL YOUNG/Collegian

James Galbraith takes the stage Thursday evening in Forum Hall as the first of four speakers this semester in the Lou Douglas Lecture Series. Galbraith covered his new book, "Inequality and Industrial Change: A Global View."

kstatecollegian.com

By ALYSON RALETZ
Kansas State Collegian

Pay inequality is a significant issue in today's developing nation.

James Galbraith, economics professor at the Lyndon B. Johnson School of Public Affairs and department of government at the University of Texas, said Thursday evening that certain regions in the United States are responsible for economic inequality.

"A very small number of places in the 1990s have become remarkably richer than the rest of us," Galbraith said.

Galbraith delivered his speech, "Created Unequal: the Crisis in American Pay," as a part of the Lou Douglas Lecture Series. He said he named his speech after his book with the same title published in 1998.

"My book was concerned with the major social issue of our time," he said. "But if you look back at thee 1930s, the topic of inequality is far from being the major topic of our time."

He said unemployment was the main concern, especially in the 1930s. In the 1970s, however, he said inequality began to rise in the U.S. Economists started to take notice.

"It did become aware," he said. "It's not known as the dismal science for nothing."

Lloyd Thomas, a K-State instructor of economics, introduced Galbraith as a part of the Lou Douglas Lecture Series tradition.

"Lou Douglas would be proud of our topic tonight, the inequality of income and wealth and its consequences and potential remedies," Thomas said.

Thomas also continued to introduce the topic.

"Looking at wage and salary income alone, the top 5 percent of households receive 30 percent of the nation's earnings," he said. "More importantly, the lowest 40 percent of households earn less than 5 percent."

Galbraith said it is not that certain state are more unequal than others.

"It is a county by county matter," he said. "Johnson County contributes the highest amount of inequality in Kansas."

Galbraith commented on wealth and its geographical location in the country.

"When profit booms become intensely concentrated by sector or region, we should be very concerned of the economic and social effects."

He said as we moved into the 1990s, there was an increased concentration in a narrow part of the economy.

Michelle Wappler, senior in human ecology, said some of his points were surprising to her.

"I never realized before how the rich moved to the suburbs and isolated themselves," she said.

"They are unable to see how other people live. They don't want to see it. We should worry when a small group monopolizes the wealth of our nation."

Wappler said she was surprised he asked the question from the presidential debates. He asked why the top percent of the country is asking for tax cuts. She said it was nice to hear him say that, since Kansas is a Republican state.

Galbraith addressed the reasons for the rise of economic inequality.

"I titled my book "Created Unequal" to suggest there was a human hand in the rise of inequality," he said.

Instead, he said, it was the outcome of specific policy decisions. He said that in the late 1990s, measures of inequality began to go up again.

"People at the bottom of the scale have been rising more rapidly than those at the top."

shopping. So we indulge in the warm silky cocoon that our life has become, and never think that others are suffering. Yes, others are suffering from injustice and inequality. They are not one or two, they are counted by the millions if not billions of individuals. We sleep with a full stomach and in a warm bed, dreaming of what tomorrow will bring us. There are, out there, millions of children, women and elders, who eat once a day or every two or three days. And what do they eat?

Don't think that they have McDonald's or KFC where they can get a fast warm food to appease their hunger. No! They beg for their food, or they look for it in the trash cans of wealthy people, or they give away their children because they no longer can feed them or provide for them.

This is a wake-up call that I mean for myself and for all decent individuals, be they male or a female, living in the town of Manhattan, Kan., or elsewhere. Let's not fool ourselves to think that we can colonize the moon while injustice is being done in our Global Village, i.e. the earth.

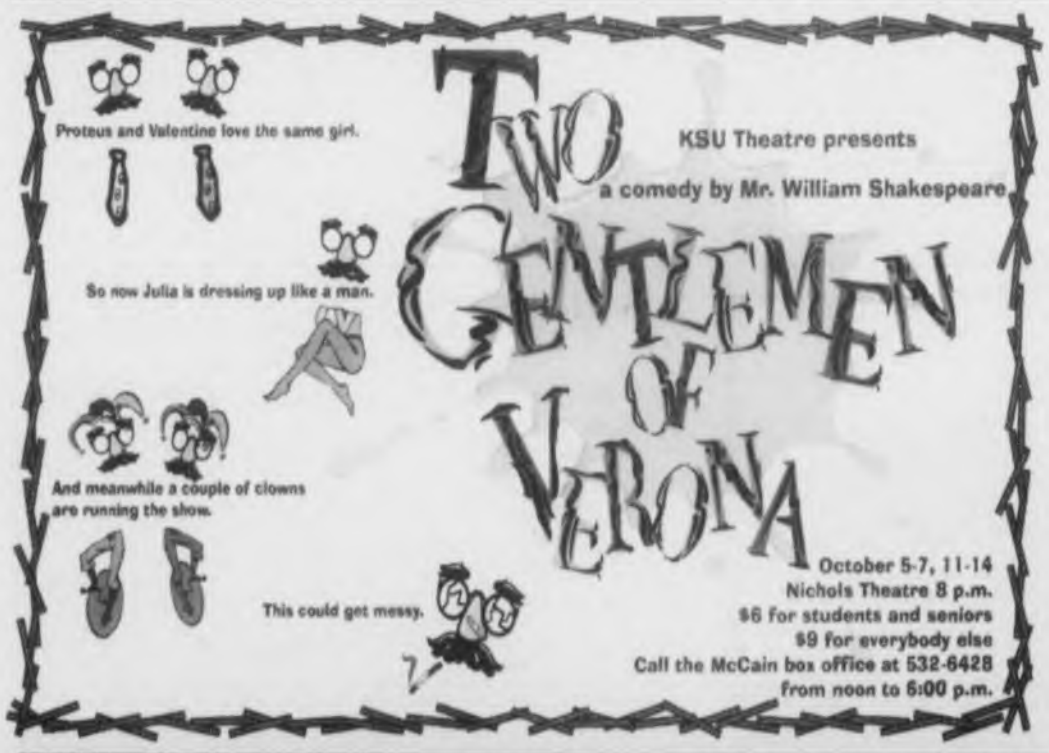
Be careful, y'all, it's here again
It's the time of year that makes the world spin
Rouletter's comin' and there's no time to spare.
So start lookin' rough and growin' that hair

The weather is right, it's gonna be cold.
The only men at this party are the tough and the bold.
For the 61st year, I'll be comin' 'round.
To drink a few beers and tear up the town.



If you're lucky, you might see me, the Rouletter ghost.
Some say that I'm rough, but I'm one hell of a host.
So, Ladies get ready to have a good time.
Cause the AGR's will be hittin' a prime.

Boys shape your hats and starch your jeans.
Polish those boots, so you're sure to be seen.
There's one definite fact that's known near and far.
You ain't partied cowboy, til it's with AGR.

power — his control of the security forces, his control of the state media, the cronies around him — I think all of those pillars are crumbling.

And therefore I think it will be very hard to deny the Serb people their victory. But I don't think anything is a foregone conclusion until he is gone."

In Belgrade, the capital, mobs seeking to topple Milosevic turned their fury on his centers of political power, leaving parliament and other key sites in shambles and flames. Hundreds of thousands of people demanded that Milosevic accept his apparent defeat in the Sept. 24 election.

Pentagon spokesman Kenneth Bacon said that as far as the United States was aware, Milosevic remained in Belgrade, apparently under the protection of his internal security forces.

Asked if the United States would intervene should Milosevic order that force be used against the Serb people, Clinton said: "I don't believe that it's an appropriate case for military intervention and I don't believe that the United States should say or do anything which would only strengthen Mr. Milosevic's hand."

Secretary of State Madeleine Albright, on a refueling stop in Ireland en route home from Middle East peace talks in Egypt, was trying to reach Russian Foreign Minister Igor Ivanov to seek his country's help in getting Milosevic to step aside.

Russian President Vladimir Putin has not recognized opposition presidential candidate Vojislav Kostunica as the winner of the Yugoslav election. He has offered to mediate between Milosevic and Kostunica.

In a weekend telephone call to Putin, Clinton urged Russia, which has been sympathetic to Milosevic, to acknowledge Kostunica. Since that call, "We have reinforced that message in other ways to the Russian government," national security spokesman P.J. Crowley said.

RIVALRY

Offensively, much of the difficulty stems from senior quarterback Dylen Smith, who Snyder said has the mobility to challenge the defense.

"He presents problems because of his athletic ability and his scramble ability," Snyder said, "and the things that they do with him running the football, as well as his ability to throw the football."

Smith's athleticism is complimented by tailbacks David Winbush and Moran Norris, as well as wideouts Harrison Hill and Roger Ross.

"I think both of those backs that they run in there are awfully good," Snyder said. "I've seen them have extremely fine football games. And they've got a group of wide receivers that have probably been featured in regards to a definite strength with their offensive football team, and I can concur with that."

"I think both of those backs that they run in there are awfully good. I've seen them have extremely fine football games."

– Coach Snyder

Defensively, Snyder said he's been impressed with KU's experience in the secondary, featuring Preseason All-American Carl Nesmith. The Hawk d-backs will be pitted against K-State's wide receiving duo of senior Quincy Morgan and junior Aaron Lockett.

Last year in Manhattan, Morgan erupted for 192 yards receiving on five receptions in the Cats' 50-9 decimation of the Hawks.

Nevertheless, the emotions will be running high on both sides of the ball on Saturday, senior Warren Lott said.

"I can tell just looking at the players. Don't say KU around them," Lott said, who will be making his second consecutive start at linebacker for the Cats this weekend.

"It's going to be like a clash of the titans. That's what everybody wants, and that's what they're going to get."

University begins campaign against violence

Campus groups make efforts to help sexual assualt victims

By NANCY FOSTER
Kansas State Collegian

Helping and supporting victims of rape or sexual assault is the concern of several groups on campus, and taking steps to ensure their safety is a priority.

"We want to make sure that every member of our university is safe both on and off campus," Pat Bosco, dean of student life, said.

Bosco said it is important that victims of assault report the instances to the city and campus police.

"There is a false sense of security here because the numbers are so low. We believe there are far more instances in our community that go unreported. We want to encourage the victims to come toward," Bosco said.

■ Committee's aim to rewrite policy on rape leads to wider focus to protect students, staff.

By NANCY FOSTER
Kansas State Collegian

What began as a committee to change the K-State rape policy has turned into a campuswide campaign against violence.

Pat Bosco, dean of student life, said the university is working on new ways to educate people about behavior, and a campuswide campaign against violence is one way K-State is trying to achieve this.

Dorinda Lambert, assistant director of University Counseling Services and chairwoman of the campaign, said the campaign has several goals. One of those goals is to recognize what is being done on campus in regard to violence.

"We want to get them coordinated in a way so that we can focus more on prevention work," she said.

The second goal is to help make campus more respectful and violence free. Another main goal is education.

"To help all people on campus to learn how to get the skills to be able to handle conflicts more effectively to avoid violence," she said.

She said the campaign will especially focus on strengthening programs for men and women to help avoid violence in relationships.

"We're aiming at preventative work," Lambert said.

While the campaign will include any issue of violence, violence against women will be a primary concern, Lambert said.

"We want to educate and make changes in how we as a community deal with violence," she said. "And also, look at attitudes of respect and behavior of everyone on campus, and how individuals can learn to be tolerant of others on campus."

She said making recommendations concerning university policy in regards to violence will be a part of the campaign, including the current rape policy.

The committee, composed of women from different departments across campus, began last year with the goal of incorporating an affirmative consent clause in K-State's current policy, and changing what the policy states as rape.

"It's a change in language," said Susan Allen, director of Lafene Health Center Women's Center. "It's rape if the woman doesn't say yes. People assume people just

K-State's blood drive ends with 866 pints

■ Total up from last fall, short of goal of 875; University of Kansas' drive not until later in semester.

By JESSICA PITTS
Kansas State Collegian

K-State students made an effort last week to beat the University of Kansas, but the battle was not in football.

The semiannual blood drive competition between K-State and KU kicked-off Oct. 12 and continued throughout the week in hopes of bringing blood into the central plains region of the American Red Cross, said Nancy Powell, representative for Red Cross Blood Services.

866 PINTS Battle for BLOOD

Each unit of blood goes to help three people in the central plains region. The Red Cross representative said the amount of units K-State students donated is about half the amount needed for a week.

"Having a competition between the rival schools is something everyone can compete in," she said. "The students really get into it, and it really brings a lot of blood into this region."

K-State barely missed its goal of 875 units, bringing in only 866, but Powell said the drive was still a success.

"Honestly, it went terrific," she said. "Last October, K-State students donated 849 units, so even though we missed the goal, we still gained something."

Each unit of blood goes to help three people in the central plains region. Powell said the amount of units K-State students donated is about half the amount needed for a week.

Richard Kelderhouse, senior in engineering, said he tries to donate blood at least once a year.

"I have donated several times," he said. "I think it is a good idea because it really helps people. I try to donate because I have one of the rarer bloods, so I am able to help people that have a harder time finding their blood type."

Besides donating blood, many students participated by volunteering for the event.

"The blood drive really is a university-wide event that brings together several organizations working for one cause," Powell said. "The students on the planning committee made the event well-organized, and the other organizations helped a lot with recruitment."

Caleb Anderson, freshmen in business administration and member of Phi Gamma Delta, said he volunteered because the Red Cross is a philanthropy for the fraternity.

"We do every year because it is something we believe in," he said. "This year, we took sign-up sheets and flyers to every fraternity and sorority, and we helped during the day at the drive."

K-State will not know who won the competition until later in the fall when KU has its drive.

Maxine Thowe of Thowe Farms, 1224 S. Manhattan Avenue, discussed pumpkins with first and second graders from St. George Elementary School on Friday morning. The children had the chance to learn about different types of pumpkins before getting to pick their own pumpkins to take home.

Pumpkin passion

Local farm attracts thousands of children for field trips

Six-year-old Devin Muir of St. George Elementary School picked a pumpkin from the Thowe Farms pumpkin patch Friday morning during a field trip where he learned about different pumpkin types.

By NANCY FOSTER
Kansas State Collegian

Fifteen years ago, Maxine Thowe had a conversation with a friend that led to a change in her life that now is a great source of joy.

The conversation went like any other: "How are you doing? What have you been up to?" The response she got from her friend was that she had just returned from a pumpkin patch.

"She said, 'You ought to do that. There's a lot of money in that,'" Thowe said.

A witch on a broom and a tin man now look over the field, consisting of more than 30,000 pumpkins, located just outside of Thowe's home.

Not only does Thowe have the patch, but she also gives short talks with school children. Dressed in a pumpkin costume, she teaches the children how pumpkins are grown, how the weather can affect them and how different bugs can infest them and wipe out the whole patch. Then the children go into the patch and pick a pumpkin.

"I did it the first time, and it rained and rained. So, I took the kids in the house and gave them hot chocolate and cookies," she said. "They were so cold and wet."

The first year Thowe put on the classes, she had about 300 children. Now, in her 15th year, she has between 3,000 to 5,000 each year.

Interacting with the children is what Thowe said she likes the most.

"I think it's just the little kids," she said. "I like the little ones the best because they are so cute."

She said the smaller ones are also more attentive and eager to hear what she has to say.

"I think there's a lot of little children that have never been to a pumpkin farm," she said. "That's why I grow them because I like to see the kids go out in the patch and see how pumpkins really grow."

Renee Reffitt, Thowe's daughter, said people began calling to schedule classes in May.

"It's funny how the little kids come to know this place," Reffitt said. "Some have been coming since preschool, and are now in sixth grade. They all know the story."

Thowe begins her classes by telling the children how pumpkins grow. The seeds are planted and then the flowers form. The flowers that form are both male and female, and for every female flower, there are seven males — all growing from the same seed.

The bees then come and pollinate the flowers. If the bees don't come, the pumpkins won't grow. After pollination, the female flowers are pollinated and then grow into pumpkins.

She tells them how squash and cucumber bugs can infest the pumpkins and destroy the entire patch. To prevent that, they have to spray a special chemical on them.

Raceway spurs opening of new turnpike toll plaza

BONNER SPRINGS, Kan. — The Kansas Turnpike Authority has closed the Bonner Springs toll plaza and opened a new one eight miles to the west.

Lisa Callahan, director of public relations for the Kansas Turnpike Authority, said the authority built the new toll plaza because of the Kansas Speedway racetrack and the large volume of traffic it is expected to attract.

The racetrack, under construction near the intersection of Interstate 435 and Interstate 70 in western Wyandotte County, will have its first races next year.

The new toll plaza opened Wednesday. Callahan said crews will be dismantling the old toll booths for the rest of the year.

"We have routed traffic around the old toll plaza while crews are doing the work," she said. "They will be trying to remove them as quickly as possible."

The new $8.5 million toll plaza has six exit lanes instead of five and three entry lanes instead of two. There is one dedicated K-Tag lane in each direction for electronic toll collection.

Water, energy bill vetoed for environmental issues

WASHINGTON, D.C. — President Clinton vetoed a $23.6 billion energy and water bill Saturday, saying it poses environmental harm by blocking his plans to let the Missouri River ebb and flow with the seasons.

The issue has set environmentalists and upriver recreation interests against downstream farmers and barge shippers.

The measure for the fiscal year that began Oct. 1 had passed the House, 301-118, and the Senate, 57-37, but the latter vote would fall short of the two-thirds majority needed to override a veto.

In a statement, Clinton said a rider attached to the overall bill jeopardizes the survival of three threatened and endangered species.

"It would also establish a dangerous precedent aimed at barring a federal agency from obeying one of our nation's landmark environmental statutes," he said.

The president also complained the overall bill is larded with scores of special projects for special interests.

And he said Congress failed to include enough money for a long list of priority concerns, including the environmental restoration of the Florida Everglades, the California-Bay Delta initiative and a plan to restore endangered salmon in the Pacific Northwest.

"It also failed to fund efforts to research and develop non-polluting sources of energy through solar and renewable technologies that are vital to America's energy security," he said.

"I urge Congress to quickly produce an energy-water bill I can sign," Clinton said.

Phi Gamma Delta chapters raise funds for leukemia

By COLLEEN FOOTE
Kansas State Collegian

The men of Phi Gamma Delta put aside school rivalry by running 70 miles for a former fraternity brother.

The K-State and KU chapters of Phi Gamma Delta joined forces to raise funds for the Leukemia & Lymphoma Society by running Saturday's game ball from Manhattan to Lawrence.

More than 120 people from both chapters were represented during the run along U.S. Highway 24 in honor of Rod Morgan, a fraternity brother who died of leukemia in 1974.

"This is a great cause, and we have a great time promoting it," Trevor Stiles, philanthropy chairman and sophomore in psychology, said. "Its been great getting to know all of the KU guys."

The Fiji Run has been a tradition between the two chapters for the past 27 years. The Fiji's had many activities in preparation for the the run, including a dinner honoring the Morgan family.

"The Fiji Run is a great honor for my family," said Amy Johnson, Morgan's niece and junior in elementary education. "We are very appreciative that his memory is kept alive by this wonderful cause."

The Leukemia & Lymphoma Society is a national voluntary health agency dedicated to curing leukemia and other diseases as well as improving the quality of life for patients and their families. In its history, the Fiji Run has raised more than $378,000, making the fraternity the largest single contributor to the Leukemia & Lymphoma Society in Kansas.

According to Kim Longacre of the Leukemia & Lymphoma Society, leukemia has no boundaries and can affect anyone at anytime, and every penny raised helps in the fight against leukemia.

"The time these young men put forth has been incredible and fabulous," Longacre said. "Each year they go above and beyond to surpass their goal."

Two representatives from each Fiji chapter presented a check of more than $39,000 to the Leukemia & Lymphoma Society at the beginning of Saturday's game.

All proceeds from the run are designated for leukemia research and Kansas Patient Aid. The fraternity raised money by going door to door and receiving donations from local corporations and businesses, as well as other greek chapters.

"We started working on this project last spring," Stiles said. "This has been a team effort, and it is so neat to see how it all comes together."

Erik Anderson, senior in finance, said he was excited for the event because it drew attention and awareness to others. He also used the memory of Morgan as motivation during the run.

"Even though I never knew him, I can't help but think this was someone's pledge brother," Anderson said. "I hope our run brought a new awareness about leukemia."

Overall both chapters of Fiji thought the run was a great success. The chapters were proud to keep the memory of a former brother alive and to perhaps help prevent others from developing leukemia.

"We always come together for this cause with a common goal," said Brian Leiker, junior in management information systems. "It is really neat to see how we all bond even though we are from different schools."

Kurt Niebuhr, sophomore in industrial engineering, helps to run the game ball to Lawrence Friday morning. The run was to help raise funds for the Leukemia & Lymphoma Society. More than 120 members of the Phi Gamma Delta fraternity from K-State and the University of Kansas ran the 70 miles.

6 members of Amish family die in house fire Saturday

By DAVID MILES
The Associated Press

ROXBURY, Kan. — Members of an Amish family that lost six of its own in a deadly house fire say their faith in God and support from their religious community is helping them cope.

"We've really felt a lot of support from neighbors and friends," Thad Thayer, the family's oldest son, said Sunday. "It's the hand of God just reaching out to us."

His mother, Mary Thayer, and five of his sisters were killed early Saturday when their farmhouse went up in flames. Six other family members suffered only minor injuries when they jumped from the second floor to escape the fire, which apparently started in a wood stove.

Thad Thayer, 25, lives about five miles east of the house that burned down in this central Kansas farming community. He said the family was doing well despite its loss.

"In all of this, God is good," he said outside the Morning Star Church, which served lunch to the family Sunday.

The family exchanged hugs and tears with friends and relatives in the church parking lot before the meal.

Harry Rhodes, a neighbor who is housing the six survivors, said Amish people from several states, including Indiana, Oklahoma, South Dakota and Tennessee, have come to help the family any way they can.

Rhodes said he had even received a telephone call from Belgium, and said his garage is filled with donated clothes and food. In addition, a nearby bank has set up a fund for the family.

Killed in the fire were the mother, 47; Justina, 15; Theresa, 13; Jessamy, 8; Dorothea, 6; and Bernadine, 3.

The survivors include the father, Richard, 51; Magdalena, 23; Matthias, 21; Andreas, 19; Alexander, 17; and Paula, 11.

A funeral service is scheduled for 10 a.m. Wednesday at Hillsboro Mennonite Brethren Church.

Brad Thayer, Richard's brother, drove from Houston to be with the family. The brother, a Baptist, said he is relying on his religious faith to get him through this difficult time.

"Without God in your life, all this is just a pointless tragedy," he said. "But with Jesus in your life, we know that someday we'll all be together again. Right now, I know that they're with Jesus."

Friends of the family said the Thayers did a variety of odd jobs, such as roofing and cutting trees, which supplemented their farm income and earned them a reputation for industriousness throughout the area.

"You just couldn't help but like them," Rhodes said. "They were always ready to help."

Mike Becker, fire chief of McPherson County Rural Fire District No. 6, returned to the scene of the fire Sunday morning to make sure there was no danger of wind reigniting smoldering embers.

The fire chief said the embers probably will burn for several days, but he plans to make sure that fire doesn't spread to the remaining outbuildings or to the family's propane tank.

Becker said Saturday's fire was the first he had fought that involved fatalities.

As Becker surveyed the fire scene, little remained of the two-story wood frame house that the Thayers had called home for the past decade.

Dogs, cats and chickens roamed throughout the property, apparently oblivious to smoke lingering from Saturday's fire.

Amid the ashes were lesson plans from the room where the Thayer children were home-schooled. Nearby, a wood swing hung motionless beneath a tree.

Becker said that, during the fire, Magdalena had told her sisters who stayed in the house that she would return with a ladder.

"I can surmise that they were younger and waited on a ladder," he said.

Becker said he had given the family two fire detectors, and he said wood-burning stoves are safe if people take precautions and properly maintain them.

"I'm going to use mine again this winter," he said.

Students should embrace other ways of living

Today marks the beginning of the annual Coming Out Week. Wednesday is national Coming Out Day.

We need to remember there is often a lot more to "coming out of the closet" than meets the eye. Usually, those who are brave enough to come forward often are faced with a more complicated lifestyle once they make their announcements.

It takes a lot of courage to come forward and announce your sexuality, especially if it is not a widely accepted viewpoint. There needs to be more compassion and understanding for those who do express their preferences.

Far too many people think that their lifestyles are correct and those who are homosexual or bisexual are living a lifestyle that is wrong. It is not fair for them to be automatically judged or labeled because of the gender they prefer.

If you decide to let your family and friends know your sexual preference, kudos to you. That takes an extraordinary amount of courage.

Perhaps one of your friends will let you know that they are coming out of the closet, so to speak. If they are serious, please remember to be open-minded and understand how difficult it might have been for them to admit this aspect of their life.

It is time to accept others for who they are, not necessarily for who they chose to love.

COMMANDER IN CHIEF

Bush lacks abilities needed to lead military

George W. Bush wants you to believe he's the man you want as commander in chief of our armed forces. If you watched the debate and have paid attention to the campaign, you should know better.

In the debate last week, Bush showed just how little understanding he has of the problems facing the military. In fact, he seemed to have little understanding of what the military even does, saying its role "is to fight and win war and, therefore, prevent war from happening in the first place." I mean, really, what does that mean, even on the level of the word?

But that's neither here nor there. We should focus our attention right where Bush has asked us to focus it: military morale, readiness and missions.

The last issue first. Bush said on Tuesday that he didn't believe in "nation-building" missions. This is not the role of the military, he said. What he doesn't seem to realize is that the countries to which American servicemembers are assigned need to lean on someone or they will collapse.

From personal experience, I can tell you Bosnia, for example, would be at war again right now if American had left on its original exit date of June 1998. Our European allies in NATO spent four years attempting to put an end to that war and failed. Only when the United States stepped in did the war end. I was serving in the country as the projected withdrawal date approached and was told by an officer of the Croatian army, the HVO, that "If you leave in June, we are ready to fight in July."

Bush seems to want to use the military in the same hit-and-run fashion as his father in the Persian Gulf War. Had we removed Saddam Hussein, stayed to help the rebellion that Big Bush asked Iraqis to begin or just stayed, period, that country would not still be such a thorn in our side. Having served as a sailor as well, I can tell you there still are sailors aboard ships in the Persian Gulf who are on a much higher alert status and more often in harm's way than I ever was in Bosnia.

Declaring victory and splitting is like eating dinner and then removing that book you've been using under the table leg to keep it level. Instability inevitably returns.

Bush is correct, however, when he says that these kinds of missions negatively affect military morale. I say amen. Since the United States has become an all-volunteer military, it must be stated that the vast majority of people who wish to volunteer actually want "action." I found this to be less the case with the Navy, but, in Bosnia, the Army repeatedly proved this point. I remember interviewing a lieutenant colonel once (yes, I, like Gore, was an Army journalist) who said the leaders of the troops were becoming concerned. "You can't ask soldiers to run around all day with guns without them wanting to finally kill something," he said. This is a simplification of the issue, but true enough. If there's one thing that soldiers, sailors, airmen and marines hate equally, it's seemingly pointless training. It is hard for our younger servicemembers (who are leaving the service most often) to realize that a quiet, boring mission is a successful mission.

TERRY WELCH

Finally, Bush has, time and time again, questioned our military's readiness. We need to invest more money in the military. On Tuesday, he also said the military has been unable to meet its recruiting goals. As for readiness, he's flat wrong. He often quotes a study that said two Army divisions (the United States has 10) were unable to be deployed. What he does not point out is that they are deployed, and that's why they aren't ready. It's not as if they're broken. Also, the Army recently announced that despite some troubles in the past, it plans to meet its current recruiting goals, and the Navy and Air Force always have been quite close to theirs. The Marines, it should be noted, repeatedly have exceeded their recruiting goals.

But if investment is what the military needs, why does Bush, despite his claims Tuesday, plan to increase the military budget by only $45 billion? Al Gore has allocated $100 billion in his planned budget to increased military spending. I find this excessive, myself, but it definitely shows another area in which Bush does not have a leg upon which to stand. We should not forget, by the way, that the military reached its two-decade nadir of readiness due to the reduction in force plans put in place by Bush's father and — surprise! — Dick Cheney.

We also should not overlook the fact that Bush uses his actions as a governor as examples of what he would do in the oval office, and that the Texas National Guard reports that several of its larger units show a lack of readiness for combat. Bush, as governor, serves as the overall commander, if not commander-in-chief, of the TNG.

A little research into Bush's assertions prove that his opinions and stances on the U.S. military are as misguided as nearly all his others.

American Indians should be remembered on holiday

A group of people in 1492 made a discovery that would change the course of history for all peoples. The Arawak nation discovered a group of tired sailors and their captain, Christopher Columbus, who stumbled upon the Arawak shore. Only eight years later, 8 million indigenous peoples in the Carribean islands would be gone.

JAKE HAWKINS

Since that initial contact, all native peoples have been struggling to recover. The effect of that historical moment for indigenous peoples, then and now, never can be measured. Most certainly, it never can be expressed in a few written words.

As members of Native American Student Body on campus, we feel the need to use our collective voice on this nationally recognized "holiday" that commemorates the beginning of a long and difficult road our people have traveled. The question is, how should we use our voice?

We could protest the deaths of 50 million ancestors between 1500 and 1900 in North America alone, or the buying and selling of our people, religion and culture by schools and sports teams who use Native American mascots in the name of "tradition."

However, closer to home and more recently featured in Tuesday's Collegian, the number of Native American students enrolling in our university has declined from 143 students in 1999 to 133 this year. To give a little perspective, Native American students make up only 0.6 percent of the student population. This has caught our attention not only as native peoples, but also as K-State students. In the upcoming year, NASB is dedicated to raising awareness of Native American and multicultural issues by bringing in Native American leaders to speak in the fall and through organizing events such as our annual Pow-wow in the spring. Providing K-State with educational and interesting events will help us promote diversity, and we invite all K-State students to join us in these events and our club meetings. However, the recruitment of Native American students will be one of our top priorities.

We can't raise the enrollment of native students alone. To follow through on this goal, we need the resources and support of the university. We need for the administration as well as faculty to acknowledge the promise of young native students and other minority groups. The knowledge and different worldviews native and multicultural students possess would enhance the learning environment by exposing all students to a variety of communication and learning styles. However, acknowledging these benefits is only the beginning. The university must show its commitment through development of initiatives to raise diversity. For Native American students, this would mean an organized and aggressive recruitment program for youth in the surrounding native communities such as the Kickapoo, Sac & Fox, Potawatomi, and Iowa reservations. K-State also could foster a more direct relationship with Haskell Indian Nations University in Lawrence or other tribal colleges. For example, students who obtained their associate degrees from Haskell could be encouraged to continue their educations here at K-State.

NASB has taken on recruitment for K-State in the past few years. However, our already small numbers and unofficial visits to reservations and schools could have been more effective with official university representation and resources beyond our own pockets. As students ourselves, we know our university is strong in academics and student life but would benefit from a diverse student body that included all nations and peoples. We would like for other Native American students from New Mexico to Oklahoma to Pine Ridge to enjoy this school as well.

For students of all cultural backgrounds, we encourage the participation in events sponsored by multicultural student organizations. These groups work hard at organizing these activities not only for the benefit of their group members, but also for the benefit of the entire student body. The promise of diversity at our institution can't be realized without the interaction of all students together.

On this national "holiday," we ask that all people at K-State remember the importance of the cultures and peoples here before that moment in history and who remain so after. NASB will continue to promote a sound understanding of diversity and foster a working relationship with other campus groups.

I hope the Native American Student Body will have the benefit of more native students to accomplish these tasks in future years.

say no, and that's not the case."

Allen said the policy was created in 1989, and that the thinking today is much different than it was 11 years ago.

Allen said many times the woman doesn't say no — that the woman is silent. Women who fear for their lives, or are too petrified to say no, often remain silent. This, she said, worries her because the silence might be mistaken as consent.

"Silence doesn't equal yes. It equals no," she said.

Allen said they will continue to work for the language change, but that it no longer is the main focus.

"The committee is turning into a campus-wide movement against violence," she said. "The policy is a small piece of it."

While the campaign committee has only had one meeting, Lambert said they hope to have an idea of all that the campaign will entail by next semester.

SAFETY

Services, said reaching out for help is sometimes the hardest thing for victims to do.

"It's very hard for some individuals to seek help when they feel so violated and so hurt," Lambert said. "Unfortunately, rape victims are very scared and find it difficult to report, or even tell their friends, that they've been raped."

When they do seek help, and seek it through University Counseling Services, she said they try to help the victims understand their feelings and to work through them.

"Rape is a crime. Sexual assault is a crime," Lambert said. "It's always helpful as a society to recognize that to make perpetrators be responsible for their behavior."

Lambert said one way they help victims of violence is to help them gain control of their lives again. This can mean going through the legal process either in the community or through the campus.

If the crime occurred on campus, the campus conduct policy will be imposed on the perpetrator.

"The legal process is very difficult for victims," Lambert said.

Many times, it comes down to a he-said, she-said process, and in order to prove a crime has occurred, the victim must seek help early. Oftentimes, finding evidence of the incident or an eyewitness is hard to do after time has passed, she said.

Lambert said when talking with victims, they inform them of the options they will have if they choose to call the police.

"It's always the person's decision whether they will prosecute someone," Lambert said.

Getting a victim to move their feelings from feeling like a victim to being in control of their lives again is something University Counseling Services focuses on, she said.

"We help them get involved again in life and to deal with issues," she said.

Individual or group counseling are two ways to help them do just that, Lambert said.

"The goal is always to help someone get a sense of what happened and help them get control of what happened," she said.

Susan Allen, director of Lafene Health Center's Women Center, said when the Women's Center handles a rape victim, it takes different measures depending upon the victim.

"We do whatever we can to be a good advocate for the individual person, so whatever she needs, we try to do," she said.

What each woman needs is always different, Allen said, but there is one thing the center does for every woman.

"The first thing to do is to make sure they are safe and to handle any medical problems," she said.

Allen said the center will refer them to groups or emergency shelters — whatever the victim needs. For some women, this means changing their class schedule, and she said they work to get that done, also.

"We just try to do what we can for the person," Allen said.

PUMPKINS

Then she tells the class what they do with the leftover pumpkins when pumpkin season is over.

"We give them to the cows," she said. "Cows love pumpkins."

She tells them how they have to break them down before the cows can eat them, because they only have one set of teeth.

"It'd be like asking you to eat an apple without using your hands," she said to the class of around 40. "It'd be pretty hard, wouldn't it?"

After showing the class examples of different kinds of pumpkins, they were allowed to go into the patch.

"I picked out my own," said Cody Huckins, a kindergartner at Eisenhower Elementary School in Junction City. "It's heavy."

Huckins said he liked his pumpkin especially because it was small.

Eric Grant, kindergartner at Eisenhower Elementary, said he had fun at the class and learned several things.

"You put seeds in it and then it grows, and then the leaves come up, and then if you water it, it grows. If you wait, then it will grow," he said.

Eisenhower Elementary kindergarten teacher Sarah Kueser said this was the first year she had been able to bring her class to the patch. So, she brought her class from the previous year along with her kindergartners.

"We like to get them introduced to fall and this was a good way to do that," she said. "It was a really good way to get them out into nature and to let them explore."

Kueser said the kids were going to take their pumpkins back to class and do different learning activities with them. In all, she said it was a good day.

"I think it's a success," Kueser said.

Equestrian team participates in Western show

K-State equestrian members rode home with a fistful of ribbons and trophies in hand with less than two months of practice as a competitive varsity team.

Out of the seven teams that competed in the two-day Western event, K-State tied for fourth in the first show, second Saturday in the morning show and fourth in the final show in Canyon, Texas.

Leading the way for K-State was Nicole Bredfeldt, a reserve high-point rider, equivalent to a second-place finish, in Saturday morning's show.

"Nicole Bredfeldt did a great job," head coach Teresa Slough said. "I knew from last year that she was capable. Last year show she almost qualified for regionals and she just went out and rode well."

Even though Bredfeldt placed well, it wasn't easy for her.

"It's definitely harder than it looks," she said. "Equestrian is something that you have to work on yourself and improve yourself. You can't always tell what you're going to have to deal with. It's the luck of the draw.

"You have to work with another animal beneath you and that's the hard thing about this sport. You're not just an individual person out there, you also have an animal you have to make do the things that you want him to do while looking good."

Physical appearance is also a key factor. Each rider spends more time getting ready for their ride than the actual ride.

However, the rider can only control themselves, not the horse they draw.

"Looking good is important but also riding well. The horses are out of our control," Bredfeldt said. "If we have a bad horse we have to deal with it and make the best of it, and if we have a good horse we just try to look our best."

Bredfeldt wasn't the only rider to bring awards home from the weekend competition. Beth Fountaine, Megan Hemberger and Heather Hicks all placed in each of their three rides. This was the first time any of the three had competed in any horse show.

"It was super to have three beginners place. They did a great job," Slough said.

Even though several riders placed, experienced team members realized they had room for improvement.

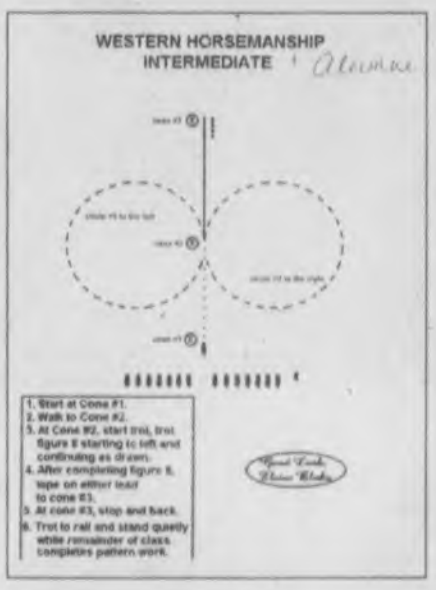
"Our lower-level riders just need some more hours in the saddle," Kelly Gratny said. "They all did a great job this weekend, but they haven't been able to experience some of the stuff they have been having to do. This is the first time they have done it so that is a little new to them. They all did a really good job and went through it well."

Slough said she sees many areas to work on in the next two weeks.

"Some of the beginners need to work on how to correctly hold there hands and things like that, and technical aspects of their pattern, like roundness of circles, things like that," she said.

"Some of the intermediate riders need to work on identifying what lead they're in more quickly. Open riders need to make clothing changes just to make them more identifiable."

The equestrian team was happy with their performance and encouraged more people to attend their next meet.



"It's exciting and people need to come see what it's really like before they start making judgments about it, because it's not just a little horse show," Bredfeldt said. "It's a lot of hard work."

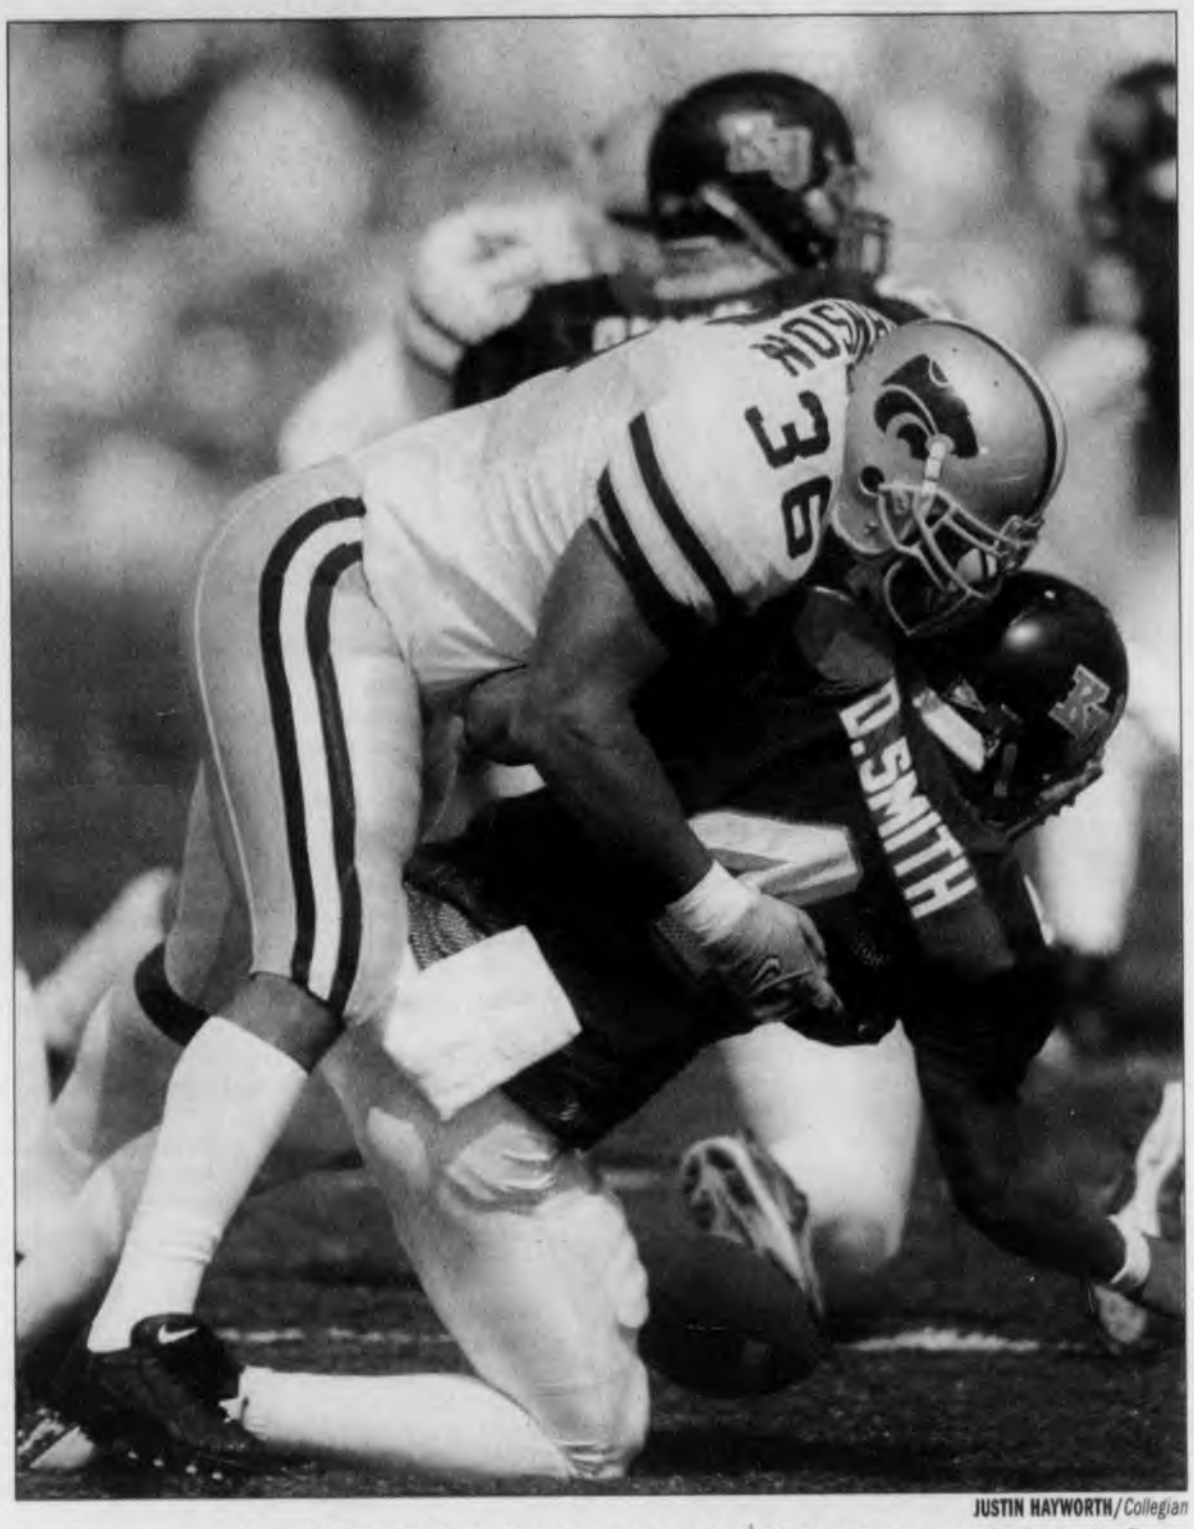
Senior tailback returns to field

By DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

When K-State met the University of Kansas this weekend at Memorial Stadium, it was more than just an intrastate rivalry. It marked the long-awaited return of senior tailback David Allen.

ALLEN

For the first time in five games, K-State fans saw No. 32 back in the Wildcat lineup, as Allen overcame a season-opening ankle injury suffered Aug. 26 against Iowa.



That comeback was a successful one, according to head coach Bill Snyder.

"David did fine. It wasn't our intention to play him a great deal," he said. "It was kind of a play-it-by-ear thing."

The preseason Dr Pepper Doak Walker Award nominee, given to the nation's top running back, only carried the ball nine times for 19 yards against the Jayhawks.

Yet, Allen's return increases the depth of an already talented group of Cat tailbacks, including fifth-year senior Chris Claybon and

Cats' defense creates opportunities for offense

JUSTIN HAYWORTH/Collegian

Thanks to the K-State defense, Saturday's Sunflower Showdown was essentially over as soon as it began.

The Kansas offense took the field first, and on just its third play, K-State defensive end Chris Johnson mowed down Jayhawk quarterback Dylen Smith seven yards behind the line of scrimmage. Smith fumbled the ball and the Cats recovered.

Game over.

Kansas ended the first quarter scoreless with six yards on 12 plays and only mustered 70 more yards, and no points, in the second quarter.

Such an early decisive play wasn't a fluke. It actually was the goal for the defense, Johnson said.

"We want to be on defense first to set the tempo, so it was a real big play," he said. "That's the way we plan it — make a big play early and let them know it's going to be a long day for them. I think we established that."

That one play did more than just set up an early score for K-State. It also knocked the shifty Smith out of the game for two series with a bruised back and left shoulder. Causing an injury, however, wasn't Johnson's goal.

"I think it gets the defense going more than it gets me going," he said. "You play your game, and you play hard, but you don't want to hurt anybody. It helped set the tempo, so if that's what we needed, oh well."

Johnson continued to dominate the Jayhawk offense all day. For the game, the senior had 16 tackles, 13 of which were unassisted. Johnson also sacked Smith twice, and his seven tackles for loss were more than any other player had accumulated the entire year.

While Johnson's performance Saturday probably was his best ever, he has played well every game this season, defensive coordinator Phil Bennett said.

"Every week, Chris has answered the bell. He's having an outstanding year," he said. "He was all over the field. He was into the game, without a question."

Johnson indeed was all over the field. On one play in the third quarter, Johnson slipped and narrowly missed sacking Smith. Instead of laying on the ground, however, Johnson got back up

'Gameday,' ABC coming to town for OU matchup

By DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

ABC Sports and ESPN will be visiting the Little Apple this Saturday when No. 2/3 K-State (6-0) meets No. 8 Oklahoma (5-0) at KSU Stadium.

With kickoff set for 2:35 p.m. local time, ABC Sports has announced it will broadcast the game, with Brent Musburger handling play-by-play duties, Gary Danielson on color and Chip Tarkenton as the sideline reporter.

This will be ABC's first trip to Manhattan since Nov. 14, 1998, when the Wildcats beat Nebraska, 40-30.

In addition to ABC's national telecast, ESPN also has announced "College Gameday" will be broadcast live from KSU Stadium this Saturday.

Chris Fowler, Lee Corso, Kirk Herbstreit and the rest of the production crew will do the show from 10 a.m. until 11 a.m. local time.

According to K-State Sports Information Director Doug Dull in a Sunday press release, further details regarding fan involvement and a potential early opening of KSU Stadium will be forthcoming later this week.

ESPN "College Gameday" was in Manhattan for the same 1998 contest against Nebraska.

K-State's victory at KU helps rankings, record

By DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

As the Wildcats made their victory lap around Memorial Stadium on Saturday, they had plenty to be smiling about.

K-State had just stomped in-state rival Kansas 52-13 on its home turf, improved to an undefeated 6-0 record on the season and secured its eighth consecutive victory over the Jayhawks in the series.

Not to mention that, with Florida State's 27-24 loss to Miami, the Cat victory moved them to No. 2 in the Associated Press poll and No. 3 in the USA/Today Coaches poll.

Yet, despite the superlatives, it was just another win for the Wildcats, senior quarterback and Heisman Trophy nominee Jonathan Beasley said.

"Just winning the game is more important for me than how much we're winning by," he said. "Offense, defense and special teams did a great job — and that's just the bottom line."

That defensive dominance was Extended streak

K-State's 52-13 victory over KU extended the Wildcat win streak to eight games, its longest in the 98-game series.

Starting off right
With the win over the Jayhawks on Saturday, K-State improves to 6-0 for the third consecutive season, the fourth time under head coach Bill Snyder, and the fifth time in school history.

Chasing a record
Senior Jonathan Beasley's four rushing touchdowns against KU give him 12 for the season, just two shy of the single-season record of 14 (Michael Bishop '98, Bill Butler '71). Beasley has accounted for 22 combined TD's this season.

The 50+ club
K-State's 52 points marked the third straight season the Wildcats have scored 50 or more points against Kansas. It also ranks as the second-highest total against the Hawks in series history, behind the Cats' 54-point outburst in 1998.

Wide margins
In the last three meetings of the Sunflower Showdown, K-State has outscored KU by a margin of 156-28. The last time the Hawks kept the Cats under 38 points in a game was Oct. 6, 1994, a 21-13 KSU win in Lawrence.

Moving on up
Senior place-kicker Jamie Rheem's made-extra point with 11:09 remaining in the second quarter moved him into second place on K-State's all-time scoring list. His 204 career points trail only Martin Gramatica (349).

Record scoring
K-State has now scored 40 or more points in each of its last five outings, tying a school record. The only other Wildcat team to accomplish such a feat was the 1998 Michael Bishop-led squad.

Touchdown tradition
The Cats have scored a touchdown on their first possession in all six games this season. In turn, K-State has never trailed in a game this season, and of the 360 total minutes played this year, the Cats only have been tied for the lead for 21:54.

Quick-strike offense
Five of eight Wildcat scoring drives against the Hawks lasted less than 3 minutes. For the season, K-State has scored in less than three minutes in 33 of 45 scoring drives.

Numbers game
Since 1990, K-State is...
– 76-5 when scoring first
– 86-5 when leading after three quarters
– 66-5 when totaling 350 or more yards of total offense
– 62-3 when allowing less than 15 opponent points
– 88-7-1 when allowing less than 25 opponent points

evident early in the ball game, as defensive end Chris Johnson decimated KU quarterback Dylen Smith, jarring loose the ball, which was recovered by junior Mario Fatafehi at the Hawk 16-yard line.

"Obviously, if you get a turnover right off the bat, that helps you with the short field," head coach Bill Snyder said.

And help the team it did.

K-State (2-0 Big 12) needed only four plays to reach the end zone on the Jayhawks (2-3, 0-2), capped by junior Josh Scobey's 3-yard touchdown run.

However, that was all the scoring the Cats could muster in the first quarter, as their next two drives stalled on a punt and a turnover on downs at the Kansas 10-yard line.

Nevertheless, it was the second quarter that blew the game wide open.

K-State erupted for 31 points in the period, sparked by three Beasley TD runs in a span of less than four minutes to give the Cats a 28-0 lead.

"We just really felt like we had to establish the running game in order to open up the throwing game, and that's really how it worked out," offensive coordinator Ron Hudson said. "And that was something we talked about prior to the game."

In fact, after Beasley's third TD of the period, the Cats' ensuing drive featured two big plays through the air, a 30-yard completion to tight end Nick Warren and Quincy Morgan's 22-yard touchdown reception with 3:16 to play before the intermission.

Martez Wesley makes a 9-yard reception on fourth and two in the third quarter of Saturday's game against the University of Kansas. Jonathan Beasley scored on a two-yard rush two plays after the catch.

MATT STAMEY/ Collegian

"It was just a big play that we needed," Morgan said. "I caught the ball and everybody did a great job blocking, and I did my job getting upfield."

K-State would get the ball once more before the half. With 58 seconds on the clock, the Cats drove 67 yards in six plays, capped by senior Jamie Rheem's 35-yard field goal as time expired, extending the lead to 38-0 at the break.

Snyder said he was pleased with Beasley's execution, especially in first half of play.

"Jon's been very consistent throughout the course of the season," he said. "I think he's improved his game week-in and week-out, playing against better opponents now that we get into conference play.

"I'm pleased with what he's done, the progress he's made, and the way he's managed each and every ball game we've played up until this point."

That confidence in the Cat QB was justified by Beasley's numbers Saturday. The senior compiled 271 yards of total offense, 235 through the air, and five touchdowns against the Hawk defense.

Beasley said the entire team's performance builds some confidence of its own for the rest of the season.

"I think it's important knowing that we can go on the road and win," he said. "Last week was a tough game for us playing in a hostile environment, and we were able to come back and play another road game, and we'll be ready to go back and play in Manhattan."

Yet, a win over their intrastate rivals is still held in high regard by the Wildcats, especially the Kansas natives.

"With all the Kansas kids on the club, it was a very intense ball game for us all week and there's a lot of guys that got excited for it," senior defensive end Monty Beisel said. "And I'm just excited for my fourth victory in a row over Kansas, and I've never lost to the Jayhawks."

Snyder agreed that it was a big win for both players and fans, but now K-State must concentrate on No. 8 Oklahoma this Saturday in Manhattan.

"For us, it's a good win, and I do not by any stretch of the imagination underplay the rivalry and what it means to people in this state, but it's behind us now, and our focus is on the next game."

junior Josh Scobey, quarterback Jonathan Beasley said.

"Each one of those guys is a special weapon for us. It's just a matter of going out there and executing," he said. "(David's) just another great athlete out there, another playmaker for us. Each one of those guys gives us a different thing, and we're going to try to capitalize on that.

"The greater depth you have, the more you're able to mix guys in and guys won't get tired. Then when it comes to the fourth quarter, you can really pound it out."

However, which of the Cat tailback trio will be called on down the stretch is just one of the lingering questions raised upon Allen's return, Scobey said.

"I don't know what the situation is going to be since David's back now, but he's a great player," Scobey said.

"And I've been doing some good things, Chris has been doing some good things, so who knows? We really don't know what our destination is right now, so we have to just wait and see."

Regardless, Scobey said he was pleased to see Allen back on the field Saturday.

"I think he came back and ran the ball real nice today," he said. "He's just coming off a severe injury, so it takes a little time. I think he's going to work that leg back up and be ready."

Nevertheless, Allen did not make his return debut as a punt returner against the Hawks, as junior Aaron Lockett continued his special team's duties.

Allen was unavailable for comment following the K-State victory, as Sports Information Director Doug Dull said the senior chose not to speak with the media.

DEFENSE

and ended up catching the quarterback 12 yards downfield.

"I was just so mad at that time that I missed the sack, I just wasn't going to stop," Johnson said. "I went and chased him on down the field."

By keeping constant pressure on the Jayhawks, the Cats were able to contain Smith for most of the game, Bennett said.

"We wanted to create doubt in his mind with the pressure," he said. "When they went empty, we'd bring the house, and if they threw it, it had to be short, quick gains."

To keep pressure on the slippery Smith, K-State often put eight players within 3 yards of the line of scrimmage and usually sent at least one man on a blitz.

"You have to get extra people in the box to try and contain him," Bennett said. "And plus, we did a lot of pressures off of it that we tried to keep his eyes from getting downfield to get to his receivers."

Despite the constant pressure, Smith and the Kansas offense did manage to put two scoring drives together in the second half.

Unlike earlier in the game, Smith was able to look downfield and find receivers, especially Harrison Hill. Smith's success was not necessarily the Cat secondary's fault, though, Bennett said.

"Harrison Hill is a good receiver, but he was pushing off. (Jerametrius Butler) got an interference call that I swore would have went the other way," Bennett said. "My guys got a little bit frustrated and backed off a little bit, and it made them a little more passive than I wanted them to be."

Although the Cat defensive backs might have backed off, Smith also began to show his capabilities in the second half, defensive end Monty Beisel said.

"We got in there and made some things happen, but at the same time, Smith moved around and made some things happen as well," Beisel said. "He's a good player, and he's very shifty and tough to play against."

Defensive tackle Mario Fatafehi found out first-hand just how shifty Smith could be. On several plays, Fatafehi looked like he had a sure sack, but ended up on the ground trying to corral Smith.

"I didn't do too good. That guy would juke me a couple times, and I would lose my shoes," Fatafehi said. "I'll practice harder and try not to lose my feet."

Over Protective Parenting

Stiller struggles to gain in-law's trust in well-casted, identifiable comedy

Review by CORBIN H. CRABLE
Kansas State Collegian

And you thought your father was overprotective.

In "Meet the Parents," Jack Byrnes (Robert DeNiro) pulls out all the stops to make sure Greg Focker (Ben Stiller, "There's Something About Mary") is the right man to wed his daughter, Pam (Teri Polo, "The Arrival").

And Focker definitely works for Mr. Byrnes' approval. In 72 hours, one hellish weekend, Focker gets a lie detector test, desecrates the remains of Grandma Byrnes, loses the family's beloved potty-trained cat, sets the house on fire and gives a nice, shiny black eye to Pam's sister in a heated game of water volleyball.

If that weren't enough, Focker has the "pleasure" of meeting Pam's ex-fiancee (played by Owen Wilson, "Shanghai Noon"), and is accused of being a pothead.

The cast in this movie is wonderful. Although Polo isn't well-known, audiences will be attracted to Stiller's sheepish, willing-to-please character and DeNiro's tough-guy role.

Fans of DeNiro won't necessarily get "The Godfather" or "Goodfellas" out of this role, but DeNiro's character is frightening enough that fans won't be disappointed. His behavior in this movie can even be called psychotic.

Stiller's character, meanwhile, basically is a clone from "There's Something About Mary." Stiller seems to be typecast as the poor, downtrodden normal guy. And, somehow, it always works, and his movies are box-office smashes. (Ok, except for "Mystery Men.")

If you've ever been engaged and had to go through the dreadful event of meeting the parents of your significant other, you know what a nerve-racking experience it can be.

In some ways, you might even be able to relate to Stiller's character (and some fathers, to DeNiro's character, although I hope none have gone to such lengths). The movie is one hilarious worst-case scenario after another, and no doubt will make you laugh at the memory of the first time you met your fiancee's parents.

Greg Focker, however, might not be laughing for a long time.

Radiohead's 4th release original, risky

Review by BRYAN SCRIBNER
Kansas State Collegian

Its songs are not likely to line karaoke bar menus.

The emotional appeal also will not lend itself to sing-alongs and soundtracks, but Radiohead's fourth album, "Kid A," will mesmerize avid fans.

The British band has not completely extinguished its guitar roots, but has taken a new approach with organs, keyboards and a computer-generated feel. Aching vocals are mixed with murky melodies throughout the album.

Some of the obscure instrumental pieces might not receive much attention at first listen; it demands patience. There are few noticeable transitions between verse and chorus, but there are many catchy phrases. It doesn't lack originality.

Soothing keyboard sounds submit a refreshing opening song, "Everything in Its Right Place." Vocalist Thom Yorke hovers over flowing chords, while electronic tones seem to mimic his voice.

The use of trumpets, saxophones and trombones add a surprising twist to the monotonous third track, "The National Anthem." The five sentences that make-up the song's lyrics pursue a strong bass line and twisted jazz ensemble.

Although "Optimistic" should be the work's most praised song, Radiohead's recognizable tenor peeks through most in the fourth song, "How to Disappear Completely." Yorke's voice is mixed with soft acoustics and various strings. The song seems to emphasize isolation, reflecting the band's third release, "Ok Computer."

The record concludes more like a church hymn than a rock album. "Motion Picture Soundtrack" could be the most beautifully composed song. Its lyrics protest the imaginary lives created in movies.

"Kid A" might seem bizarre for those unfamiliar with Radiohead. It apparently was not created for market success, but the addictive tones deserve attention. After more than a decade together, the band seems to be doing what it wants regardless of public perception.

Radiohead has elected to release no singles or videos promoting the record. Of about 24 recorded songs, 10 were engineered for "Kid A." It took about three years to polish the track listings.

Nigel Godrich, who produced "Ok Computer," also directed this disc. Some parts of the record were produced while the band toured in 1998.

Creating "Ok Computer" took the band about the same amount of time as "Kid A." Although this release will have a tough time competing with its predecessor, it is a refreshing and intelligent piece, which is exactly the boost modern-rock fans should appreciate.

The band says it will release a more radio-friendly recording early next year. In the meantime, "Kid A" could be one of rock's most profound risks.

Exhibitors travel to Manhattan for annual arts, crafts show, raise funds for hospitals

By JENNIFER O'NEILL
Kansas State Collegian

Cold weather didn't hold off the pursuit of shoppers Saturday and Sunday at the 27th Annual Pumpkin Patch Arts and Crafts Fair, sponsored by the Mercy Health Center Auxiliary, a volunteer organization that supports Mercy Health Center Inc.

All proceeds from booth rentals and food sales will go to benefit the hospitals.

The aroma of potpourri filled the air as some people browsed and others bought everything from handmade soaps and jewelry to Christmas items and handcrafted furniture.

The fair was a mix of exhibitors from Kansas, Missouri, Nebraska and Iowa.

People came from all over Kansas and surrounding states to buy folk art, porcelain figurines, children's toys, candles, dog treats, country clothing, quilts, bird houses and other items.

Virginia Babcock, chairwoman of the fair, said the fair has a good reputation and the exhibitors put it on the top of their lists every year.

Frank Staggenborg, exhibitor from Marysville, Kan., sells K-State memorabilia and said he is happy with the results from the crowds each year.

"This is the only fair I come to, and we seem to get lucky here every year," he said.

Tami Forbes, a fair-goer from Clay Center, Kan., has been coming to the fair for three years.

"I love what it has to offer," she said. "I did all my Christmas shopping here last year."

Through the years the fair has developted a relationship with both the visitors and the community.

Doug Harms, fourth-year fair exhibitor from south-central Nebraska, said he appreciates how Manhattan and surrounding areas support the fair every year.

"It's a real good show, we've loved doing it every year," he said.

The American Institute of Baking was also at the event to raise money for its scholarship fund.

The institute has been a participant in the fair for three years.

"We always do real well here," said Ken Embers, instructor at the baking institute. "There's always a lot of anticipation of folks for this bake sale for a number of items."

All items were baked by the institute's 55 students. People had their choice of goodies such as cobblestone bread, carrot cakes and home-made tortillas.

Karen Brockenicky, chairwoman of last year's fair, said the auxiliary always receives compliments on the diversity of the items and the good food.

Babcock said she hopes to raise anywhere from $10,000 to $20,000 for the hospital.

"The weather never seems to have an effect on people — they come here anyway in full force," she said. "And at the end of the day, people walked to their cars loaded down with bags and the feeling knowing that they helped contribute to a great cause."

Newly elected Yugoslav president works to restructure government

By GEORGE JAHN
The Associated Press

BELGRADE, Yugoslavia — Fresh from engineering the ouster of Slobodan Milosevic, backers of President Vojislav Kostunica wrestled Sunday with a new daunting task — creating a government free of powerful Milosevic allies without alienating them.

Even though Kostunica's authority was cemented by his inauguration as Yugoslav president Saturday, potential resistance to him remained on two levels: from Milosevic appointees still in place in federal ministries and from the powerful government of the Serbian republic.

Serbia, one of two Yugoslav republics, makes up 90 percent of Yugoslavia's population of 10 million. Its pro-Milosevic president — who by law has more powers than Kostunica — controls about 100,000 police, and indirectly much of Serbia's economy.

In addition, the Yugoslav army, whose top leadership switched loyalties to Kostunica on Friday, obliquely criticized the unrest that helped bring him to power.

In a statement after a meeting Sunday between Kostunica and the top army leadership, the army said that it expressed concerns about certain occurrences in the country during the postelection period that are not in accordance with the constitution and the law.

The statement indicated that the military was abandoning the role of complete subservience that it played under Milosevic for the more traditional one of a pillar upholding law and order in Yugoslavia.

How to keep the state running on near empty coffers was another problem — Yugoslavia is bankrupt after a decade of stifling international anti-Milosevic sanctions and widespread corruption.

A top economist tipped to become the new central bank governor on Sunday said a further blow to the country's economy was narrowly averted in the dying days of the Milosevic regime.

Mladan Dinkic, who heads the team of Kostunica's economic advisers told a televised phone-in program that backers of the new president turned off the central bank's computer system to prevent raids on state coffers by Milosevic cronies.

Dinkic also implicated Milosevic in unspecified economic wrongdoing.

"Milosevic has at most, a week to leave the country, or he will have to face court, and I don't mean the one in The Hague," said Dinkic, alluding to the U.N. war crimes court in the Netherlands that has indicted the former president.

Dinkic said Milosevic's associates tried to take away at least $22.5 million electronically and in cash.

Earlier, Dinkic demanded that Milosevic be prosecuted for vote-rigging in the controversial Sept. 24 election.

"We now expect state prosecutors to bring charges against Slobodan Milosevic," Dinkic said. A human rights group in Yugoslavia, the Humanitarian Law Fund, also demanded punishment for the ousted autocrat, issuing long lists of his alleged misdeeds.

Yugoslavia suffered a decade of international sanctions under Milosevic meant to punish him for starting four Balkan wars that were accompanied by a string of atrocities. The sanctions — and rampant corruption ascribed to Milosevic cronies — have left the country bankrupt.

Seeking to ease the suffering, the European Union said it will make a start Monday toward lifting those economic sanctions.

Dinkic also called for a donor's conference on Yugoslavia with the aim of injecting at least $500 million into the cash-strapped country over the next year.

But the main challenge facing Kostunica and his advisers Sunday was how to form a federal government quickly to replace the pro-Milosevic administration, while attempting to coexist with the Serbian republic's leadership.

Die Fledermaus
Tuesday, October 17, 7:30 p.m.
Join us as we raise the curtain on one of the most well loved operettas of all time, Johann Strauss's Die Fledermaus: a bubbly concoction of champagne, masquerades, amorous flirtations and practical jokes. Western Opera Theater has assembled some of the world's brightest young talents for this lively journey into the romance of Strauss's delightful melodies set in the intoxicating extravagance of late 19th century Vienna.
Pre-performance lecture by Dr. Reginald Pittman.

Public $20
Senior $18
Student/Child $10

Inti-Illimani
Friday, October 27, 8 p.m.
The seven members of this Chilean-based ensemble have enraptured audiences with their special blend of instrumentals and vocals for decades. Playing more than 30 wind, string, and percussion instruments, they have traveled the world weaving an extraordinary cultural tapestry and taking audiences on a tour through the love and pain of daily life. You won't want to miss the ensemble that's recorded more than 30 albums and performed for Amnesty International on stage with Bruce Springsteen, Mercedes Sosa, Sting, Wynton Marsalis and Peter Gabriel.

Public $18
Senior $16
Student/Child $9

The Second City
Friday, November 3,
7:00 p.m. & 9:30 p.m.
What do Julia Louis-Dreyfus, Chris Farley, Bonnie Hunt, Tim Meadows, Bill Murray, Jeremy Piven and George Wendt have in common? They're all alumni of a club that opened its doors in 1959: Chicago's Second City. The club's specialty, improv comedy, was brand new, and success was instantaneous, earning The Second City Time Magazine kudos as "a temple of satire." Now, maybe you can't take off for a night in Chicago. That's all right. For 30 years The Second City has taken its show on the road and this year it's coming to Manhattan. So get ready for a medley of classic scenes, songs and improvisations that are always original, daring and hilarious. Presented in Nichols Theater. Performances are for mature audiences.

All events, dates and times are subject to change without notice.

Swedish academy to honor candidates with Nobel prizes

By KIM GAMEL
The Associated Press

STOCKHOLM, Sweden — A person deemed to have made the most significant discovery in medicine will become a Nobel laureate on Monday, kicking off a week of prize announcements culminating with the prestigious peace award.

The prizes, each worth $915,000 this year, are always surrounded by speculation. The suspense for the literature award — usually the first announced — was heightened last week when the Swedish Academy failed to reach a decision, leaving the timing of that announcement uncertain and bumping medicine into the top slot.

"Sometimes they come to a decision very quickly," said Svante Fregert, an editor at the daily newspaper Svenska Dagbladet. "But they probably have two or three names, and if the vote is even, then they have to do it again."

The winners of the prizes for physics and chemistry will be announced Tuesday and for economics — the only one not established in Nobel's will — on Wednesday in Stockholm. The peace prize is to be announced Friday in Oslo, Norway.

Alfred Nobel, the Swedish industrialist and inventor of dynamite, left only vague guidelines in his will establishing the prizes. The selection committees deliberate in strict secrecy.

The only public hints available are for the peace prize. The five-member awards committee never reveals the candidates, but sometimes those making the nominations announce their favorites.

This year's includes President Clinton and former President Jimmy Carter for wide-ranging peace efforts, as well as former U.S. Sen. George Mitchell for his efforts to resolve conflict in Northern Ireland.

Other reported nominees are former Finnish President Martti Ahtisaari and former Russian Prime Minister Viktor Chernomyrdin for their Balkan peace efforts; South Korean President Kim Dae-jung for promoting good relations in Asia; and a town, northern Albania's Kukes, for accepting 150,000 refugees during the Kosovo conflict.

The academy traditionally keeps the date of the literature prize secret until a couple days before it announces the winner, but it is always a Thursday, usually in October.

Last year, they caught prize-watchers off guard by announcing the literature winner on the last day in September.

Paolo Mauri, culture editor of the Rome-based daily Repubblica, has suggested — as many others have — that Chinese writer Bei Dao or Belgian writer Ugo Claus would be named the winner.

Other possibilities include usual suspect V.S. Naipaul, a Trinidad-born writer living in London, two of the world's great short story writers, Canada's Alice Munro and Ireland's William Trevor.

Among other favorites mentioned in speculation are Salman Rushdie, Peruvian Mario Vargas Llosa; Israel's Amos Oz; Nigerians Chinua Achebe and Ben Okri; South Africa's J.M. Coetzee; Canadian novelist Margaret Atwood and Americans John Ashbery, Philip Roth, Joyce Carol Oates and Norman Mailer.

"It's a mixed blessing having the prize," said Swedish publisher Jonas Ellerstroem, who has had contact with many Nobel-winning writers. "They will have to spend quite some time being this year's winner."

The literature and peace laureates usually are the most visible, but the new adjective often also brings scientists more attention from outside their laboratories.

As for the first announcement, Nobel's direction that a prize be awarded to the person who made the most important discovery within the domain of physiology or medicine is interpreted by a committee of 50 professors from the world-renowned Karolinska Institute in the Swedish capital.

National Coming Out Week begins with family forum

By JJ DUNCAN
Kansas State Collegian

Coming out to anyone about being gay or lesbian can be a difficult task, and Monday night, members of the Queer Straight Alliance discussed coming out to those that matter most — family.

NATIONAL COMING OUT WEEK

"Some people don't realize that we want the same things that others want out of heterosexual relationships," said Christina Hauck, faculty advisor to QSA and associate professor of education. "We want to be loved, we want to have friends, we want to have social lives, and most of all we want our families to love us."

The meeting, which was held in the Sunflower Room of the Student Union, was the first in a series of events sponsored by QSA that are scheduled for National Coming Out Week. This week is dedicated to those who are coming out gay or lesbian, and Wednesday is National Coming Out Day.

Members of the Gay and Lesbian community and some of their parents spoke candidly on the subject of dealing with a child who is coming out. Sandy Harding professed the fears that arose in her mind when her son, Heath Harding, Vice President of QSA, came out.

"I won't lie. It was a traumatic occasion, but not for the reasons that most people would think," she said. "The trauma was out of concern for Heath, and for his safety and future because there are many people who still aren't accepting of the gay community."

Heath said the fear of him being in danger isn't unfounded, but he still feels compelled to be open with his sexuality.

"I know people who have been bashed, someone who was hit with a pipe and had to get stitches, others who were spit on, and people who are verbally abused," he said. "Still, I will walk through Aggieville with my boyfriend, we have held hands in bars and I will continue to do that. That's because I feel an obligation to those who came before me to be open with my orientation."

Gerald Hanna, professor of education, said when his daughter, Gladys Hanna, junior in social work, came out, the family wasn't dismayed but surprised. Coming from a liberal background, Gerald said the family was very accepting of Gladys, but they were still nervous when meeting her girlfriend.

"In that situation your acceptance is truly tested," he said. "It's interesting to find out if your liberal views are going to hold up when the chips are down, but we

OU president cancels class after Texas win

By REED DUNN
Kansas State Collegian

Oklahoma's victory over Texas resulted in the announcement of canceled classes at all OU campuses Monday.

Jeff Hickman, OU press secretary, said University President David Boren made the announcement following the 64-13 victory Saturday.

"It was very spur-of-the-moment," Hickman said. "Halftime was the first discussion of it all."

Hickman said the game has historically been a big game for rivalry. He said former President George Lynn Cross was the last to cancel class following a football victory.

"It was kind of a way to recognize the tradition of the game," Hickman said. "It hasn't been done in more than 25 years."

Chris Kannady, Oklahoma student body president, said the excitement of such a big win was mixed with applause and shock after the announcement of canceled classes.

"Students don't expect to go there and have it be a blowout game," Kannady said. "We've never really seen anything like this."

The cancellation of Monday's classes resulted in a four-day weekend for Oklahoma students. Since students do not have a regularly scheduled fall break, Friday classes were also canceled to give students a break. Kannady said many other universities are given two days for a fall break between the beginning of the semester and Thanksgiving break.

"The extra day was more of a reward to students," Kannady said. "It is definitely well deserved."

Amy McFall, editor of the Daily Oklahoman, said the rivalry between the Sooners and Longhorns has been a long-time tradition. She said classes would not have been canceled after any other victory.

"It's really big," McFall said. "Even if you're not a football fan, you go to this game."

The victory helped to complete a great week at the university, Hickman said. Earlier in the week Oklahoma wrapped up a five-year campaign that raised $508 million for the university, which is one of the four most successful fund-raising efforts by any public university. An art collection from the Clara Weitzenhoffer estate was also given to the university this week, and features $50 million plus in work from French artists.

"The entire week had been an exciting week at Oklahoma," Hickman said. "This was a great way to honor the finish of a great week."

Moore Hall residents pursue victims to bathrooms, class

By APRIL MIDDLETON
Kansas State Collegian

Chris Fratzel, junior in mechanical engineering, is in first place in this year's game of Gotcha in Moore Hall. Fratzel has "assassinated" five students while managing to stay "alive."

Residents of Moore Hall haven't been traveling alone. They've been taking refuge in class, at work and in the bathrooms.

The odd behavior of Moore Hall residents is attributed to Gotcha, a game of assassins played with water guns.

The game involves 72 students this year. Those students who want to play sign up and are given an assignment.

Mari Johann, sophomore in pre-art therapy and criminology, said target assignments don't include obvious information. The assignments are written so that every player will have to do some investigation and observation to figure out who their target is.

Assignments include a Polaroid picture that reveals only half a person's face and an alias. Other information that is included is height, weight and shoe size.

"The only information that is helpful really is the Polaroid and the alias," Johann said. "The other information is just for the fun of the game."

As with all games, there are rules that players must follow. Targets may only be killed when there are no witnesses. Players may not kill their target in class, at work or in the bathroom.

The object of the game is to avoid being killed. Once a player is killed, their assassin takes their target.

The game started Oct. 2 and will run until Nov. 1 or when there is only one player left. The winner will receive a prize that has not yet been determined.

Of the 72 players who started, 32 are left.

"Usually the first week is pretty intense. Some people won't go anywhere alone so they can't be killed," Johann said.

Jon Krasnoff, sophomore in open-option, said some players are really intense about the game, but that's what makes it so much fun for the players.

Marie Konarik, freshman in pre-dentistry, said she has stayed alive this far into the game because she is always cautious of who is around her.

"I always check down the hallways when I leave my room. If anyone looks suspicious, then I make my roommate go with me," Konarik said.

Konarik said she enjoys the rush from always being paranoid about assassins. So far, Konarik said, Gotcha has been a blast.

"The cool thing about this program is that it's semi-long-lasting. Residents can really take ownership of the game," Krasnoff said. "Everyone makes it as fun as they want to."

Krasnoff said the game is scheduled at

Campus safety concerns evolve; common sense key to security

By NANCY HULL
Kansas State Collegian

Safety issues on the K-State campus have evolved over the years.

In the 1980s, people began stealing cassettes and car stereo equipment, said Lt. Dave Johnson of the K-State Police. Over the past 10 years, parking permit and bicycle thefts have been increasing. Within the last year, laptop computer theft has concerned campus police.

"The good news is that there haven't been many crimes against people. The bad news is that there is property crime," Johnson said.

Keeping a close eye on personal items is the best way to prevent against theft, Johnson said.

"Students need to realize they can't leave things unattended," he said. "When people put things down and go to the restroom, things like books just seem to walk off. The biggest thing is that people need to lock their cars, bikes, belongings and residences when they leave."

E.J. Guillen, junior in computer engineering, uses his laptop on campus often and said he has considered buying a lock for his computer.

"When I go to a different building, I always ask someone to watch it," Guillen said. "It's something I have been concerned about, but I don't think it's a big problem at K-State."

Kari Jensen, junior in nutritional sciences, said she always locks her car when she parks on campus. She said she has friends who had compact discs, stereos and money stolen from their cars when they were parked off campus.

"If I had a nice car I might be more concerned, but also you never know who could be hiding in the back," Jensen said.

She said she always tries to take a friend with her when she walks to Hale Library late at night, and she recently started carrying pepper spray.

"I think there are a lot of hidden problems that go on. My freshman year, I heard that so many rapes occurred in my dorm, even though I never had any proof," she said.

Johnson said many services have been upgraded to make students feel safe when walking on campus at night.

He said the lighting has increased and improved each year. There are now about 25 help phones around campus, Johnson said. By pushing a button, students can call a K-State police dispatcher at any time. Johnson said there are always four or five officers on duty.

"Whether officers are on car, bike or foot, there's always one nearby," Johnson said. "As the student population has grown, we've improved everything to keep abreast."

Campus police work together with the Wildcat Walk student escort program to increase safety on campus, Johnson said. If an escort is not available during the program's hours of 6 p.m. to 6 a.m., Johnson said the police will be available to provide safe walks.

Jean Darbyshire, adviser for the Wildcat Walk escort service, said there hasn't been an increase in students using the service.

"I think a lot of students believe campus is safe. It is well lit, and students will walk across campus with friends," Darbyshire said.

She said Manhattan's low crime rate helps students feel safe.

"When you measure our problems with theft of parking decals up to the problems of a school that's more urban, we're much more safe," she said.

Johnson said he's proud of the safety of the K-State campus.

"We're one of the safer schools in the Big 12," he said. "We have an excellent student body. There aren't a bunch of problem people here."

Rape rates, crime spree add concern about safety around city

By NANCY FOSTER
Kansas State Collegian

On the street where Becky Dennison lives, there is no lighting in front of her house.

Living on Claflin Avenue, only two blocks away from campus, Dennison, junior in psychology, said she is too afraid to walk home alone at night.

She said she doesn't feel safe at all, and relies on friends and roommates to pick her up.

"For example, tonight I'm suppose to meet someone to study, and I'm having my roommate come pick me up because I don't like walking on the street," Dennison said.

The question of Manhattan's safety has become a concern due to recent reports of rape on the rise and the vehicular burglary spree.

Dennison said whether she feels safe in Manhattan is a matter of how well-lit the area is.

She said the path she takes from campus to home is poorly lit — if at

Former Kansas governor dies Sunday at age 73

OVERLAND PARK, Kan. — Former Gov. Robert Bennett, a scholarly politician who often sent reporters scrambling for dictionaries after news conferences, died Monday after fighting lung cancer.

He was 73.

Bennett, a moderate Republican who served as the state's 39th governor from 1975 to '79, died at St. Joseph Health Center in Kansas City, Mo. He was admitted there Sunday, said his daughter, Virginia Bennett-Hesler, speaking from the family's Overland Park home.

Bennett's election as governor followed a 10-year legislative career, including two years as Senate president.

A Johnson County attorney for four decades, Bennett most recently served as co-chairman of the Kansas Justice Initiative, an 18-month study of the state court system.

Bennett-Hesler called her father the best father and grandfather ever"

"That was the part that the public didn't get to see, what we were honored to get a part of," she said.

Bennett was well-known as a strong debater with a dry sense of humor.

When he was elected in 1974, Bennett was the first governor in Kansas to run on a ticket, with Lt. Gov. Shelby Smith. That election also marked the expansion of a Kansas governor's term from two years to four.

He appointed the only woman justice on the Kansas Supreme Court, Kay McFarland, in 1975. She now is the court's chief justice.

Bennett lost a re-election bid to John Carlin in 1978.

Bennett remained behind the scenes in Johnson County politics after losing his re-election bid.

"He was respected by everyone for his intellect and commitment to public service," said Smith, now a lobbyist, Monday. "It was stimulating to just be around Bob Bennett."

Clinton starts peace talks for Middle East disputes

WASHINGTON, D.C.— With violence continuing among Israelis and Palestinians, President Clinton started another round of telephone diplomacy Monday and weighed the possibility of flying to Egypt for a peace summit this week.

The president spoke with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak, Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat and President Bashar Assad of Syria on Sunday.

Secretary of State Madeleine Albright, meanwhile, spoke with the foreign ministers of Egypt and Norway on Monday, part of a daylong full diplomatic press to salvage the peace process.

The administration is employing every kind of measure to get the security forces talking to each other, and has sought to impress upon Arafat and Barak that there must be give-and-take if lasting peace is their goal, Albright told ABC's "Good Morning America."

"It's not a matter of concessions. It's a matter of both of them understanding that they can't have 100 percent of what they want, and that there can't be a victor and a loser," Albright said.

Israelis and Palestinians exchanged gunfire Monday, just hours before Barak's deadline for forceful action by Israel if Palestinians don't take steps to halt the violence, which began 12 days ago and has killed more than 80 people, mostly Palestinians. Barak convened a Cabinet meeting to determine compliance with that ultimatum.

Among the victims of the violence was an American-born Jewish settler, Hillel Lieberman, found dead Sunday in the West Bank. News reports said Lieberman was a second cousin of Democratic vice presidential candidate Joseph Lieberman, and his campaign asked the State Department for more information to determine whether the two men are related.

Albright left open the possibility of a summit meeting in Egypt to pursue a plan to halt the violence, but said no final decision has been made.

Ford Explorers display escalated accident rate

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The Ford Explorer has a higher rate of tire-related accidents than other sport utility vehicles even when fitted with tires made by Goodyear, according to an analysis by The Washington Post.

Ford, from the beginning of the Firestone tire recall, has said the accidents that killed 101 people, most of them in Explorers, were the result of tread-separation problems with Firestone tires.

But in a report published Monday, auto analysts told the Post there appeared to be something about the Explorer that might be contributing to the accidents.

The Post analysis gives an indication that there might be a factor with the Ford Explorer beyond the tire issue, said James Fell, who retired last year as the head of research for the National Highway and Traffic Safety Administration. "It's a first indicator that they may have a stability problem."

Officials at the Ford Motor Co. and Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co. said the Post analysis was faulty because the number of accidents examined was too small to be meaningful. They also said accident databases don't always accurately identify vehicles and that Explorers shouldn't be compared to the full range of SUVs.

The newspaper analyzed a national database of 2,000 fatal accidents involving SUVs and concluded that Explorers had a higher rate of tire-related accidents than did other SUVs. That could be a statistical fluke because the database was so small, the Post said.

Data collected in Florida covered 25,000 fatal and nonfatal SUV accidents in which there were 83 blown tires. "Tire blowouts in Goodyear-equipped Explorers contributed to crashes at rates more than double those of other SUVs," the paper reported.

Electric rates debated

■ Government officials consider equalizing bills across Kansas regions.

The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Federal regulators will attend a hearing in Washington, D.C., this week on whether Western Resources customers in different parts of Kansas should pay the same rates for electricity.

Customers in Western's KPL division fear such a requirement would mean large rate increases, while those in the company's KGE service area maintain equal rates are only fair.

The Federal Energy Regulatory Commission hearing which starts Wednesday is expected to last between two and three days.

Last year, the city of Wichita filed a complaint with the commission over the disparity in rates charged by KPL and KGE.

KGE customers pay about 25 percent more for electricity than their KPL counterparts. The rate disparity is due mainly to the $3 billion Wolf Creek nuclear power plant, which KGE helped build before it merged with KPL to form Western in 1992.

KPL serves consumers in northeast and north-central Kansas, while KGE's customers are in Wichita and surrounding counties in the south-central part of the state.

If FERC orders equal rates, Topeka Mayor Joan Wagnon and others say it would force an increase of between 16 percent and 20 percent in KPL's rates. Companies in the KPL service area have said such an increase could threaten their profitability and could force them to relocate some of their operations.

"Equalization would have a catastrophic impact on Topeka and many other cities and counties in the KPL area," Wagnon said in testimony already filed with FERC.

Both sides have hired experts to bolster their cases. Wichita's expert, Timothy R. Corrigan, a Denver consultant, is expected to testify that Western shouldn't be allowed to charge different rates because it operates as a single utility.

"The separate operating entities of KPL and KGE exist only as historical cost accounting entities from many years ago, and do not reflect operating realities on Western Resources' system," Corrigan said in prefiled testimony.

He also said, "This commission should require Western Resources to cease the charade of KPL and KGE as independent contracting entities."

According to Corrigan, Western has used an internal operating agreement to subsidize KPL's operations at a cost of more than $300 million to KGE consumers.

Topeka has hired Christopher C. Pflaum, president of Spectrum Economics in Overland Park, as its expert. In his prefiled testimony, Pflaum said that during merger negotiations, the Kansas Corporation Commission had promised KPL ratepayers they wouldn't have to pay for Wolf Creek.

"In the end, everyone was assured that KPL customers would not be disadvantaged by requiring them to assume any costs of Wolf Creek," Pflaum said.

Topeka attorney John Frieden will argue on behalf of a coalition of cities in the KPL service territory.

Frieden said he was encouraged by the fact that the FERC staff is siding with Topeka and its allies.

In prefiled testimony, FERC staff analyst Willie L. Oxendine said the commission's merger policy requires that customers of merging companies not be harmed.

"In the case of the KGE and KPL merger, if equalization of Wolf Creek is ordered, then KPL's customers would certainly be harmed," Oxendine said.

College students' vote influences local, national policy

By SHAWN HEIN
Kansas State Collegian

The second official debate between presidential candidates George W. Bush and Al Gore airs Wednesday night, and many students who tune in might wonder how they can make their voices heard.

The first step is registering to vote. K-State students can pick up a registration application for any county in the state in the K-State Student Union's Office of Student Activities and Services anytime from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m., Monday through Friday. Students then must send in the form to the county where they want to be registered. Registration applications must be postmarked 15 days before election, Oct. 23.

Shelly Roben-Lojka, assistant coordinator of OSAS, said her office serves a basic purpose in the voting process.

"What we're trying to get out is that an election is coming up and that we have information for students to get registered in Kansas," Roben-Lojka said.

Roben-Lojka said students who have questions about the voting process in the particular county they're voting in should contact the county clerk.

Students who vote in the state of Kansas but outside of Riley County will receive an advanced ballot with their application for registration. According to Jolene Campbell from the county clerk's office, voters should send in their advanced ballots about a week before the election to give their clerks time to receive them and send out an actual ballot to the voter.

Sue Seitz, account clerk for the city of Manhattan, said registering people to vote has kept her busy.

"It's normal for a major general election — we're busy from the minute we walk in to the minute we walk out," Seitz said.

Campbell said she's happy to see people registering, but a difference still exists between registering and actually voting.

"Because of all the registration booths set up around campus and other places, there are a lot of people who will register," Campbell said. "Most, though, don't actually get out and vote."

Campbell also said students who wish to register to vote in Riley County and have their vehicle insurance under their own name will get charged personal property taxes in Riley County.

While many students' single votes won't make a tremendous difference in national elections, there are many important local issues they can affect, Campbell said.

"I strongly believe it does matter more on a local level than national level. You can change how elections turn out at the local level," she said. "Issues like sales tax, drinking and smoking impact college students and a large college turnout can impact such issues."

Scott Jones, assistant dean of student life, said students should get involved because the decisions being made are affecting their lives now.

"I think it's essential for college students to vote because politicians make policies that directly affect students' access to college and students' funds for college," he said.

"Students are a very influential and an intelligent voting block whose voice should be heard."

Voting, politics important to students' lives

Right now the presidential race is a dead heat. One day, George W. Bush is leading the pack, and the next, Al Gore is top dog.

It is time to change the apathetic stereotype that is reinforced with the lack of voters between the ages of 18 and 24 years.

Part of the problem involves people who think their vote doesn't count, that their opinions do not matter. However, voting someone into the most powerful position in the world is a responsibility citizens should not take lightly.

It is important to know both sides of the candidates, regardless of whom you opt for. Web sites for each political candidate are updated constantly. Not only do these sites contain information about campaigns, but they also contain links to retrieve flubs about their opponents.

There is another presidential debate on Wednesday. This is a great opportunity for voters to decide whose platform they support.

Yet it is important to remember the men who stand behind these figures — the vice presidential candidates. Hopefully, nothing will happen to the president we elect, but if something does, Dick Cheney or Joseph Lieberman will step in and continue to lead our country.

Make sure to research candidates outside of the main race, as well. Ralph Nader and Pat Buchanan might offer the type of leadership unavailable from the country's top two parties.

Not only is this national campaign important, but local elections are just as beneficial, if not more. With these elections one vote can make a difference.

It is time to get in the habit of not only voting, but keeping track of the political world. The world of debates and campaigning has more of an effect on your life than you might realize.

Vouchers will force education into short-term, unworkable solutions

ZAC COOK

It seemed like a good idea at first. Take out fast and don't look back. Burn rubber, pedal to the metal and intimidate the others from the beginning. With no training, I ran on emotion. This was the viable option, make them follow my plan.

For the first 200 meters, I beamed in the first-place glow. But the next seven laps killed my plan. I finished the 3K race nearly dead last of 24 runners, and that's when I learned the consequence of rash emotional thinking. I was only 14 that hot summer night in Hays Kan., but I realized you need to train to tackle a project.

School vouchers seem like a good idea. Take your children out of school fast and rush them to that magical school in the sky that produces scores of 36 on the ACT. Forget about what will happen later. Make a beeline for the nearest charter school and cash in those vouchers.

Get back your tax money and show the government you can do better than its schools. Smile as your kids race ahead at first. Then watch in horror as the system collapses. Gasp as you realize you are falling short of the finish line, and realize you didn't train correctly to hurdle the school improvement problem.

Public schools today do have problems, but vouchers are not the solution. Vouchers are a sprint, but education is a lifelong marathon. Hold up all you Hermes parents and examine the flaws. Ponder these points.

1) Voucher schools would use discrimination — on the basis of gender, religion, IQ, mental and physical handicap or the family's ability to pay. Required discrimination will become normal. Education will live in a capitalist world, and that means winners and losers. If the school thinks your little Jimmy doesn't make the cut, he won't. He loses. You lose. And there is nothing you can do about it because this competition supposedly is what would cause improvement in schools.

2) Voucher schools would be exempt from stringent safety provisions in place on public schools. True, they would have to be safer than most Manhattan student housing, but as private entities, they would gain many exemptions from code. How much do you value safety? These new schools will be pinching every penny to insure high test scores.

VINCE JACOBSON/Collegian

3) Even though they would receive money from tax funded vouchers, voucher schools are not required to provide any financial records of operation to taxpayers. No private corporations are required to in a capitalist system. Rather than worry about changing this law to force private entities to subject to public scrutiny, we should improve our existing public schools.

4) Public schools as we know them would be devastated by the huge fluctuation in capital. School administrators are wringing their hands. They are not ready to compete in a capitalist environment. Peter Schrag of the Sacramento Bee wrote, "(vouchers) leave hundreds of thousands of the neediest children stuck in schools that are worse than the schools they're in now."

A better plan for our nation's school system is more specific funding. Each state could propose sweeping changes, but disparities still would exist nationwide.

Better schools are critical to continued U.S. economic prosperity, and human capital is the nation's largest shortage. With inequality widening, second-rate schools condemn many individuals to a lifetime of low income and second-class citizenship. To prevent some schools from falling in the cracks, federal intervention is needed.

Al Gore and George W. Bush both have pledged federal money in the race to improve American education. Bush's plan would use $13 billion over five years. Gore pledges $115 billion over 10 years. Neither candidate has released specifics of their marathon of spending, but at least they are not advocating a voucher quick fix. I applaud both for realizing vouchers faults.

Kansans should remember: Vouchers are sprint, but education is a life-long marathon. Improve your school, don't run away from it and in the long run, your kids will come out winners.

Women's personalities can intimidate men

Her name was Booger, and she played basketball.

Perhaps I should explain. Her name probably wasn't Booger (although I guess I can't be sure); it was just the name on her jersey. And when I say she played basketball, I use the phrase loosely.

Granted, she was on the basketball court and a part of a basketball team. Additionally, she did dribble and occasionally put a shot toward the basket, but that is about where the similarities end.

CLINT MUDRICK

She towered above other players at a staggering 5 feet, 2 inches. She would toss the ball to the opposing team, sit down and laugh. She would put up a three-pointer, get the ball halfway to the hoop and dance her way down the court to the other end. She was terrible. She was indifferent to turnovers. She was among the cutest and most captivating people I've come across.

So it was that our basketball games became more enjoyable each week, not because our team was so exciting but rather because Booger and pals played one court over. But I digress.

The point is, Booger was the sort of woman who could cause every guy in our bleachers to temporarily abandon his dirty ways just long enough to want to give the woman a hug. And, more unbelievably still to those who might scoff at our sex in Gender Roles classes, a hug truly was the extent of the lust.

We knew she lived in a residence hall, and we were pretty sure it wasn't Haymaker. Beyond that, we knew she used the pseudonym Booger.

That was about the extent of our information, and that was a problem.

It was decided that, among the six of us in the Booger fan club, one would be able to get her, take her out once or twice and maybe even get that hug. The problems surrounding the situation were thus of little importance. We called several residence halls, asking each if they knew of a Booger. After a series of hang ups, we finally happened across a lead. We had a number. We still lacked a name, but we had a number.

As this is dragging on, I will sum up. None of my friends ever went out with Booger. This wasn't because she turned any of us down (and I'm not saying that's at all unlikely) but rather because none of us ever called.

Yes, after hours of investigation, several hang-ups and the sort of questioning that would embarrass any group of people with normal levels of self-consciousness, we officially gave up. We surrendered because Booger, this woman who evoked images of nothing save sweetness and hugability … well … scared the living hell out of us.

The point, very simply, is this. The women who go out every night clad in stretch pants and brightly-colored halter tops bar hopping, drinking heavily and occasionally engaging in enthralling two-women make-out sessions at Porters (let me state for the record that I've never condemned such actions) tend to be the women who guys have little problem approaching. They are outgoing and, more importantly, they are a dime a dozen, indistinguishable from one another.

Those women who possess their own personality are a good deal more intimidating. The psychology behind this is simple. If such a woman turns down a guy, he is not instantly able to jump to the body-double dancing next to her.

Thus it was with Booger. Because she was so unique and interesting, she was unapproachable. The catch-22 of college dating again reared its ugly head.

This is not entirely a story of male cowardice. Rather, it is a response to a female friend of mine who complained that guys don't like classy women. The reality is that some guys do. It just so happens that those of us in the market for such women often are the same guys with the idiot male complexes I have mentioned in previous articles and no doubt will be forced to discuss in later ones.

Guys eventually do build up the courage (or alcohol) to approach the otherwise unapproachable women, but by that point the right woman is long gone and said male gives up and finds comfort in "Seinfeld." From there, he will re-enter idiot status, misread signs again and end up thinking he's dating a woman who's looking around the room for someone else.

Booger's whereabouts are unknown; her visage is now only in the annals of intramural basketball and within the memories of a group of male fans. Yet the message remains; for the women out there looking to shed the typical college woman image, don't give up. There are guys interested out there; we're probably just hiding on the bleachers at the Chester E. Peters Recreational Complex.

New activity center fails to represent all organizations

Editor,

After reading Joseph Hurla's column Friday, I would like to further comment on the new plan for the student activities center.

This new center would create a centralized setting of organizations on campus registered with the Student Governing Association. The center would create a centralized location for new students to get involved. Also, it will create a campuswide unity to all organizations and increase the efficiency for these organizations to reach their goals. This plan is centered around three key organizations: Student Governing Association, Union Program Council, Greek Affairs, as well as multicultural organizations. In this plan, the Kansas State University Association of Residence Halls is being left out. KSUARH is the second-largest campus organization at K-State, yet it is ignored by SGA. KSUARH represents more than 3,500 students who live in 10 residence halls. Many of these residents are first-year students, just waiting to get involved. By isolating the residence hall students, they ignore the possibilities of future leaders at K-State.

Let all the students benefit from a new center. If it can't represent all students in the K-State Student Union, then do not even conceive of an idea concerning a new center that ignores the second largest campuswide organization.

A solution to the student activities center plan is that an increase from $6.50 to $6.75 in the proposed privilege fee. This extra 25 cents could go to renovation of the KSUARH office in the basement of Putnam Hall. This way, the Hall Governing Boards from the individual residence halls could be brought together, similar to the way SGA wants to bring all the organizations into one place. If SGA helped pay for a renovation to the current KSUARH office, it would bring all the residence halls together to better the halls, represent SGA in a more efficient manner, and let students get more involved in student life. After all, this proposal is to bring all the campus organizations together, not exclude a certain few. This is for the students at K-State, and if it does not benefit all students, the center will not serve its purpose.

Surgical center under construction, to be opened to public in January

■ Manhattan to benefit from center specializing on specific operations.

By JENNIFER FARR
Kansas State Collegian

Construction of the Manhattan Surgical Center at the intersection of Kimball and College avenues will be completed and open to the public in January.

The Manhattan Surgical Center leased the land from Mercy Health Center Inc. and the 21,000 square-foot building is now under construction near the health center's College Avenue campus. Richard Allen, chief executive officer of Mercy Health Center, said the closeness of the two sites will benefit the community.

"In health care, we're dealing with a finite amount of health dollars," Allen said. "Especially in smaller communities we have to be very cognizant of how we spend those dollars. It's my feeling that the closer the facilities are to each other, the closer you can work together and not duplicate those health care dollars."

The center will contain three operating rooms, eight extended-stay beds and two speciality suites. The center will concentrate more on outpatient surgeries than anything else, said Ward Schraeder, operating manager for Manhattan Surgical Center.

"The effect of a surgical center is that we focus on a certain type of thing," Schraeder said. "We focus on, more or less, outpatient surgeries. We are not trying to provide everything in the health care industry."

Although the Manhattan Surgical Center is leasing land from the hospital, the two companies are not affiliated in the ownership of the new building. The Manhattan Surgical Center is one of eight centers run by local physicians and ASC Midwest, a limited liability corporation.

The center will benefit the community by taking about 30 percent of all cases in Manhattan, Schraeder said. The center anticipates around 5,000 cases within its first year of operation.

E-mail program helps women in science, engineering fields

■ MentorNet matches female students looking for experienced job help.

By ALLISON RUSHTON
Kansas State Collegian

Women are finding more opportunities to prepare themselves for the workplace with a new e-mail program called MentorNet.

MentorNet is the National Electronic Industrial Mentoring Network for Women in Engineering and Science. It matches women undergraduate and graduate students with people in the professional world, allowing pairs to communicate weekly via e-mail on topics in the industry.

Suzanne Franks, director of the Women in Science and Engineering Program, said the goal of MentorNet is to allow students to enhance their persistence in fields where they remain underrepresented and to facilitate their entry into scientific and technical careers. Franks said she hopes the program will attract and keep women interested in the engineering program.

"Our goal is to do everything we can to recruit and retain women in these fields," she said. "MentorNet acts as an on-line support system."

Although the overall number of women in the workplace is almost 50 percent, Franks said only about 30 percent of scientists are women, and only 10 percent of engineers are women.

MentorNet works by having potential students and mentors fill out applications online. These applications are free and ask questions dealing with what kind of fields applicants are most interested in, such as math, astronomy or nuclear engineering, and what kind of issues people would like to focus on, such as industry knowledge, job searches and résumé advice.

MORE INFO?
Students wanting more information or wishing to apply to the program can do so online at www.mentornet.net

"I think it's a great idea," said Kim Precht, senior in biological and agricultural engineering. "I'll be going to grad school, and so I'm hoping to get some advice about that."

Brandy Hanson, senior in architectural engineering, also has applied to receive a mentor, and said she would like to get a female professional's viewpoint of balancing her professional life with family.

Hanson and Precht, like other women at K-State, filled out applications online about three weeks ago. They have yet to hear back.

Franks said students shouldn't worry if they don't hear back from MentorNet immediately.

"There are several rounds of matching," she said. "Since this is a nationwide program, it could take a couple of rounds to be matched."

Franks said MentorNet received more applications for students than mentors last year. Not wanting to leave anyone out, they created a e-mail discussion list as a forum for students and mentors who aren't paired. The Listserv is semi-facilitated and provides topics of conversation.

"I won't mind if I get put on the Listserv, but I would prefer to have a mentor," Kara Davis, junior in architectural engineering, said. "I think the one-on-one correspondence would be more beneficial."

Davis said that while she would like to get paired with someone in her field, she also considered geography when filling out her application.

"I requested someone in San Jose, because I would like to do an internship in California, and it would be nice to make some connections there," she said.

MentorNet was started in 1997, and about 50 universities nationwide use this program today. In order for a university to participate, it must first pay a fee to the organization. This is the first year that K-State has been a participating university.

"This program has been made possible by a grant from the Cargill Foundation," Franks said. "We're very thankful for that."

Franks said she thinks the program is going to be a huge benefit for all the women who participate.

"I would like to see a lot of students participate in our first year," she said. "It will really help them find out what is important and is a great opportunity."

K-State women's volleyball team works toward greatness with recent hot streak

By MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

K-State's volleyball team needed a momentum-building win at Oklahoma last Saturday, and it got one with a 3-0 sweep of the Sooners.

MCLAUGHLIN

With the win, the Cats (11-4, 5-2) increased their current winning streak to two games. K-State will have to keep the streak alive, however, to achieve its main goal — to become a "great" team by Nov. 1, head coach Jim McLaughlin said.

To do so, though, will require a set line-up, something the Cats haven't had in the past two matches.

"We've got three weeks left to be a great team, and I think we've seen a little bit of a trend," he said. "I think we can get on a hot streak. The key is, once we get that line-up fixed, then it's just an acceleration of learning, the curve will be more vertical."

Fortunately for the Cats, their line-up problems don't stem from poor play in some areas, but from great all-around individual performances.

The competition for spots is especially fierce at the outside hitter position, where Liz Wegner, Lisa Mimick, Julie Thomas, Jenny Pollard and Cari Jensen are all fighting for spots and have all played well throughout the season, setter Disney Bronnenberg said.

"It's really heated at the outside hitter position right now because we have a lot of really, really good hitters," she said, "and I think it just makes them more competitive."

The battle for these spots has been heightened by injuries. First, Mimick broke her foot, and her replacement, Jensen, helped lead the team in kills. Then Pollard missed the Oklahoma match with a strained muscle in her lower back, and Thomas stepped in with seven kills and the team's best service percentage.

The addition of Thomas to that list might have been surprising to some at the beginning of the season. Last year, the senior was a situational defensive specialist, but this year, Thomas's unselfish attitude has earned her a starting spot the past two matches, McLaughlin said.

"She's a rock. She does whatever we ask whenever we ask it," he said. "She's a good kid, and she thinks about this team more than anything. She does what this team needs, but those people shine. People that are unselfish shine at some point, and Julie is shining.

"She was a stud at Oklahoma — she did it all. She passed, she blocked, she served. She had our best serving game."

While Thomas has stepped up her game in all facets, Jensen has struggled to add more to her game beyond hitting, McLaughlin said.

"Her strength right now is she does kill the ball, but we also need consistent passing. We also need consistent blocking," he said. "It's just her getting comfortable doing so many things. She's a great player, but I want her to be a great volleyball player."

Tennis team opens season with mixed results

By MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

K-State tennis got off to a mixed start at the Indiana Hoosier Classic last weekend, the team's first competition of the fall season.

Highlighting the weekend for the Wildcats was the doubles team of juniors Alena Jecminkova and Kathy Chuda. The pairing won four straight matches to claim the No. 1 doubles title Sunday afternoon. After struggling in their first and debut match, the duo narrowly won in the third set 9-7; the pair only surrendered seven games in the next three matches.

Jecminkova and Chuda's tough play down the stretch was not typical of their practice prior to the tournament, however, head coach Steve Bietau said.

"Their practice has not been very good so far. We spent some time discussing that last week before the tournament, and obviously they responded well," he said. "They're both very talented, capable players, they're just making a lot of errors."

While Jecminkova and Chuda were able to improve during the tournament, the Cats' more established doubles pairing of Eva Novotna' and Petra Sedlmajerova struggled, finishing the weekend with a 1-2 record. The reason behind the couple's struggles are a mystery, Bietau said.

"They did not play well together," he said. "I was surprised by that because they were a good team last year."

Individually, the Cats showed consistently better play. K-State once again was led by Jecminkova, who advanced to the No. 1 flight singles final, but lost in three sets to Monica Rincon of Ohio State. Meanwhile, Sedlmajerova advanced to the semifinals in singles play, but also lost to Rincon.

The two Cats played well, but Rincon was just better last weekend, Bietau said.

"She was very good. I was impressed with her," he said. "We took two good shots at her, but she won."

By advancing to the semifinals, Sedlmajerova could have played in a consolation final, but poor weather slowed the schedule by causing the tournament to move indoors, which due to travel constraints, forced the team to leave early. Missing the match was not as important, though, as it would have been in spring play, Bietau said.

"It's a lot like spring volleyball," he said. "We'd like to know who won, but it's a developmental thing."

Leaving early also allowed the team to get a little more rest after the exhausting tournament. Due to the stress of travel and competition, the team won't practice as hard the next two weeks off before the next tournament, Bietau said.

"The team is very tired. From a coaching stand point, we treat it like a two week block of competition starting with the tournament last weekend," he said. "We try to make adjustments, but we won't really get into the volume of practice like we had before Indiana."

Pigs continue to fly with table set for Cat championship run

FRANK FLATON

I was sitting at my computer pondering what to write in my weekly column when the strangest thing happened: a pig flew by my window.

Bewildered, I turned on the television to catch the news. Clips of George Bush and Al Gore's debate were on. And to my surprise, Bush wasn't a moron and Gore was charismatic and exciting. I switched to MTV and there were good videos on. No Britney Spears or Christina Aguilera.

After that, I really started to freak out.

I just knew that somewhere in hell the Devil was wearing a parka and prepping for a morning ski on the Hades slopes.

There's only one thing that could cause this paradox: the K-State football team is gaining national respect. It can't be. No. Say it ain't so (enter "Twilight Zone" music and screams here).

For the past four years, the Wildcat football team has won 39 games, lost just two regular season games and has one of the winningest records in the '90s, second only to Florida State. Still, the national media has used the Cats as their whipping boy, insulting them for their weak schedule and refusing to put them in the national title hunt.

But that's all in the past. This season is drastically different.

The Wildcats have rolled to one of their best starts yet and the Purple Craze is starting to spread. At first, the usual schedule cracks were there. But the Wildcats put them to rest by clobbering a good Colorado team in Boulder.

Then a little luck had Florida State dropping to Miami and the hype started to speed forward like an Aaron Lockett punt return.

Now, the Wildcats are ranked No. 2 in the Associated Press poll, K-State's highest ranking this early in the season. With Nebraska at No. 1, two teams from the same conference grabbed the top spots for the first time since 1987, when Nebraska took 1 and Oklahoma took 2. Who would of thought the Wildcats would be in this position?

I probably don't have to say it, but this now sets up a top notch regular season "national championship" caliber game right here in Manhattan on Nov. 11.

Speaking of Oklahoma, they moved to 5-0 after pimp-slapping Texas this weekend. Due to this and K-State's success, ABC has decided to pick up the broadcast. In the past, the Wildcats were lucky to get a Fox Sports bid. And the national attention hasn't ceased.

Last season and in 1998, the Wildcats consistently were in the top five and the majority of their games weren't even on television. Well, that's all starting to change.

Chris Fowler, Kirk Herbstreit, Lee Corso and the ESPN "Gameday" Crew won't miss K-State's showdown with the Sooners this week. In fact, they most likely will be in Manhattan twice this season.

That's a shocking twist of events considering that Fowler and the boys headed to Blacksburg, Va., for a meaningless Virginia Tech/Miami matchup when the No. 6 Cats took on No. 3 Nebraska last season.

For years, K-State fans have moaned and groaned about not getting the respect they deserve.

K-State, though, has now made a diving tackle into the end zone of national spotlight. Corso and other analysts have picked the Cats to win it all and every week the Wildcats are a favorite to win.

K-State has everything laid out in front of them. The world is starting to realize. They now are a member of college football's prestigious fraternity. They are no longer the new kid on the block. Now, the Wildcats have to win their games and the prize is theirs.

Maybe pigs are flying and hell is freezing over (it is a little chilly in Manhattan). Or maybe the rest of the world is just figuring out what the Purple People have known for years.

Former Cat Bishop throws 1st touchdown pass in NFL

Former K-State quarterback Michael Bishop threw a 44-yard TD pass, a hail mary to Tony Simmons, on the final play of the first half, helping New England (2-4) to a 24-16 victory over visiting Indianapolis (3-2).

It was the second consecutive win for the Patriots after four losses to open the season.

K-State/Texas Tech game possibly to be televised

In a Monday press release from the Big 12 Conference, the Oct. 21 football game featuring Texas Tech at K-State is one of three conference games that might be televised.

ABC Sports and FOX Sports Net will each air one of the contests, with one game going untelevised. Aside to the Cats matchup with the Red Raiders, the other two Big 12 games under consideration include Missouri at Texas and Texas A&M at Iowa State.

Meanwhile, Fox Syndication already has confirmed that it will air Colorado at Kansas on Oct. 21.

ABC will notify the Big 12 Conference office Sunday of the Oct. 21 telecast selections.

This Saturday's Big 12 telecast schedule has already been confirmed, with Texas A&M at Baylor aired on Fox Syndication, Oklahoma at K-State on ABC, and Nebraska at Texas Tech featured to air on Fox Sports Net.

2 K-State freshmen receive preseason hoop recognition

K-State freshman Laurie Koehn was named to the first team Women's Basketball News Service's Preseason College All-Freshman Team, released in late September.

The 5-foot-8-inch guard from Hestor, Kan., joins WBNS Preseason Freshman of the Year Erika Valck of Purdue, USC's Ebony Hoffman, Lindsay Taylor of UC-Santa Barbara and Connecticut's Diana Taurasi on the first team.

In addition, K-State's Nicole Ohlde, a 6-foot-4-inch guard out of Clay Center, Kan., was honored on the WBNS second team, along with Shameka Christen of Arkansas, Duke's Alan Beard, Nicole Powell of Stanford and Boston College's Amber Jacobs.

Meanwhile, aside to her WBNS honors, Koehn was also named a top incoming college freshman in the Athlon Sports College Basketball preview edition. She was one of five Big 12 women on the list, including Texas' Stacy Stephens, Jolee Ayers and Natalie Ritchie of Texas Tech and Syreeta Stafford of Colorado.

Koehn was U.S. basketball's third leading scorer on the 2000 gold medal-winning Women's Junior World Championship Qualifying team this past summer, after averaging 37 points, 5.9 rebounds, 3.4 assists and 5.2 steals as a senior at Moundridge (Kan.) High School.

Ohlde, a USA Today honorable mention All-American from Kansas, posted 18 points and 12.9 boards per game in 1999-2000 at Clay Center (Kan.) High School.

Koehn, Ohlde and the rest of the K-State women open their season Nov. 7 in an exhibition game versus the Basketball Travelers. Tip-off is set for 7 p.m. at Bramlage Coliseum.

Clark hires assistant coach to focus on hitting, running

K-State head baseball coach Mike Clark announced Oct. 3 the addition of Steve Miller to the Wildcat coaching staff.

Miller will help in the development of all phases of the program with emphasis on coaching hitters, infielders and baserunning.

He comes to K-State after serving as an assistant coach at Nicholls State in Thibodaux, La., where he was responsible for coaching catchers, overseeing the strength and conditioning program and all administrative duties.

Miller previously served as a volunteer assistant at K-State under Clark in 1997.

"We're glad to have him back at K-State," Clark told K-State Sports Information. "I feel that he is one of the top young coaches in the nation. He is an extremely hard worker and relates to the players well. I look forward to having a nice, long relationship with him."

Miller fills the slot in the Wildcat baseball program vacated by the resignation of assistant Robbie Moen, who left K-State earlier in September to take a job as the top assistant coach at Loyola Marymount University in Los Angeles.

WHO: Derek Jackson assistant director of Housing and Dining Services for residence life

Derek Jackson sees more than the academic side of students.

He also gets a glimpse into their social life.

Jackson, assistant director of the Department of Housing and Dining Services, is responsible for the supervision of the residence halls, including helping with student activities and educational and judicial situations.

He said he enjoys working with the K-State residence halls because of the energy of the students.

"I like the involvement level of the students and their desire to make a difference," Jackson said.

When he's not spending time with the students, Jackson said he enjoys reading, sports, outdoor activities and spending time with his wife and daughter.

Stray Cat Tattoo & Body Piercing on Laramie Street opened its doors for business Sept. 30. The shop is trying to establish a good reputation in Manhattan through superior artistry and a friendly attitude.

STRAY CAT TATS

story by JJ Duncan

New tattoo parlor strives to establish reputation with artwork, friendly attitude

The buzz of a tattoo being worked on, the flash art on the walls and the ready piercing apparatus signal that all systems are operational at the newly opened Stray Cat Tattoo and Piercing.

Stray Cat opened on Laramie Street Sept. 30.

Right now, the challenge is to make people aware of the shop's presence, said John Fitzgerald, manager and piercer for Stray Cat.

The fact that the shop just opened means the employees are striving to establish a solid reputation for the shop in Manhattan. Robert Miller, tattoo artist for Stray Cat, said the quality of the employees and their work should create a positive reputation. The artistry sets Stray Cat apart from other tattoo shops, Miller said.

"The artwork is way beyond what anyone else in this area is doing," he said. "We can do anything, even portrait work with photo realism — anything."

Fitzgerald said he hopes to establish a reputation for being a shop with a friendly attitude. Some shops project an elitist feel that alienates people who are getting their first piercings or tattoos, he said.

"When a girl comes in to get her naval pierced, scared out of her wits, and it's her first time in a tattoo shop, she has no clue what to expect," he said. "If she's scared and people are being mean to her on top of that, that's not the way it should be."

Fitzgerald, who has more than five years of experience in piercing, said alleviating people's fears, especially the first time they come in, is part of his job. Often, people build up how much the piercing is going to hurt in their mind so that they scare themselves. In reality, the pain is far less than what people expect, he said.

The psychological build-up combined with the actual piercing sometimes creates undesirable effects. Fitzgerald said some people just go pale for a minute, while some actually vomit. In one case, not even he expected the results of the experience.

"I pierced this one girl and she was fine, she gave absolutely no sign that she was going to pass out," he said. "I turned around and she was white as a ghost so I hear hug her, holding her until she comes back to. I hear something hit the floor so I look down, and as I was hugging her, there's this pee that's running down my pant leg."

For Kody Cushman, tattoo artist at Stray Cat, tattooing is one more form of art that she has taken on. Cushman has worked on comic books, fashion design, animation and photography, and she said tattooing is a great career for her.

Skin is one of the toughest mediums to work with because of its imperfections, curves and changes in texture, Cushman said. A good tattoo artist has to be able to envision how the art will look on a three dimensional body as they are applying it.

Eric Ortmann receives part of the outline of his first tattoo on his shoulder Sunday afternoon at Stray Cat Tattoo & Body Piercing. Ortmann says that when completed, the tattoo will cover the majority of his upper body.

"When you are tattooing someone, you are working with a different canvas every time," she said. "The fun part is that it always changes, it is always a challenge and you can never completely master it, which is pretty cool."

Another challenge for the artist is to gain the respect and trust of the person who is being tattooed, Miller said. Gaining that trust gives the artist more freedom to do more complicated and original artwork. The longer people collect tattoos, the more they find what style they like and what can actually be done with tattoos, he said.

"People are often uninformed about what can and can't be done with tattooing," he said. "We can do really complicated artwork that is much better than people actually think we can do. They still have this image of Grandpa's tattoo and they think that's all we're capable of."

Cushman said after doing tattoos for a while the artist can help people bring other people's ideas to life. The tattoos can say much about the person by expressing individuality that people can see.

"I call it putting your insides on your outsides," she said. "Most people have this cool idea but they think in two dimensions, but when they tell me about it I can envision how it will look, almost like I can hold it. It's cool for me to take their thoughts and bring them to life and put them on the outside of their bodies."

Miller said that when getting a tattoo, a customer should look through books of the artist's work and pay attention to quality. It is important not to just let anyone with the equipment apply a tattoo. He said the customer should find artists with styles they like and look at photos of the artists' work after it heals.

"Always look for photos of tattoos after they have healed because if the artist isn't proud enough to show you healed photos of that work, then they are probably not that good," he said.

Working in one of the few professions outside of the medical field where people completely relinquish their bodies to a technician who modifies it can be a very stressful pressure, Fitzgerald said. Still, he said he has high hopes for the future and with everyone helping out, it should become a wise business decision.

For those who wonder why anyone would ever want to get a tattoo or a piercing, Fitzgerald said he tells them the same thing he tells small children.

"When a little kid asks me why I have them, I squat down and ask 'You remember Christmas?' and they say 'Yeah.' 'You remember how you decorated the Christmas tree?' they say 'Yeah.' I tell them, 'Well I just wanted to decorate me,'" he said.

Yanina Langer, senior in horticulture therapy, grimaces while receiving her first tattoo Saturday night at Stray Cat Tattoo & Body Piercing. Langer had a lotus drawn on her lower back. Many people who get tattoos now are beginning to bring in more of their own designs.

Presidential race intensity rises with candidate scrutiny

By TOM RAUM
The Associated Press

AUSTIN, Texas — Forget any return to civility in the excruciatingly close presidential race. To Al Gore's camp, George W. Bush is a bumbler and babbler. Bush advocates call Gore a serial exaggerator, a guy who just can't tell the truth.

Gore's embellishments and Bush's botches could pose serious political problems for each in the final month of the campaign, analysts and politicians suggest. And both camps are intensifying their criticism.

The Bush campaign has issued e-mail press releases it calls "The Gore Detector: A Regular Report on Al Gore's Adventures with the Truth." And Gore officials say a portion of his Web site will be devoted to Bush's flubs.

Gore advisers said his campaign is feeling the sting of the GOP efforts: Polls suggest Bush has picked up support since last week's first debate. The Gore people hope voters will decide Bush is being too negative and will reverse the trend one more time.

Gore's occasional trouble with the facts and Bush's problems with language are long-recognized traits that are getting added attention with the race so close in the final weeks of the campaign.

"Both problems are equally serious and disturbing," said Larry Sabato, a political scientist at the University of Virginia. He said Bush's gaffes reinforce suggestions of intellectual shortcomings while Gore's embellishments fuel concerns about his honesty.

Eight of 10 people think Gore is intelligent and well-informed compared with seven of 10 for Bush, according to Time-CNN and Newsweek polls. But people think Bush is more likely than Gore to say what he believes and not just what voters want to hear, the polls say.

Gore foes point to two statements in particular from last week's debate: He said he inspected flood and fire damage in Texas in 1998 with James Lee Witt, the director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, and he said a 15-year-old Sarasota, Fla., girl was having to stand in an overcrowded science class.

Gore since has acknowledged that he went to Texas but not with Witt and not to the disaster area. And the principal of the school in Sarasota said the girl only stood one day.

Meanwhile, Bush detractors cite his sometimes convoluted descriptions, jumbled syntax and occasional difficulty explaining his own programs.

Over the weekend in Florida, Bush fumbled his arithmetic on taxes and wound up just spitting out numbers. At another point, he criticized Gore's health plan saying, "He wants the doctors to make every decision on behalf of every patient" — just what Bush contends wouldn't happen.

While some critics say Bush's mistakes indicate a shaky grasp of issues and facts, Bruce Buchanan, a government professor at the University of Texas and a longtime Bush watcher, suggests the more likely problem is fatigue.

"When he gets tired and is under pressure, he has a tendency to misspeak," Buchanan said.

Gore's political foes have long pointed to what they see as a tendency to embellish his role in events, such as his assertions about the creation of the Internet.

Gore said over the weekend that he had made factual mistakes, but he said Bush had, too, and "I don't describe that as fictitious or an exaggeration. It's just a mistake."

Sex study numbers explained

By PAUL RECER
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — For years, scientists have puzzled over why surveys show the overall population of men has more sex partners than does the women's population. It should come out even.

Now they think they have the answer: the surveys didn't measure the activity of prostitutes.

"The number of partners that (heterosexual) men have had must be equal to the number of partners that (heterosexual) women have had," said Devon D. Brewer of the University of Washington. "Each new partner for a man is also a new partner for a woman. So, in reality, it must be equal. By definition."

But the General Social Surveys, conducted by the University of Chicago, and the National Health and Social Life Survey, funded by private foundations, found that men were claiming up to 74 percent more partners than women.

The government uses this data to design public health programs to combat sexual diseases.

Brewer said social scientists, scrambling to explain the embarrassing inconsistency, suggested one of two basic problems — survey subjects were lying, or there was some fundamental flaw in the way the data was being collected.

"One explanation was that men are boasting or bragging about their number of partners, and that women were being modest," said Brewer.

That might be a factor, he said, but a study he co-authored says the biggest cause of the discrepancy is the surveys ignored the professionals: women who perform sex for profit.

"We found these high activity women, prostitutes, were inadvertently excluded by the design of the surveys," said Brewer, whose study appears Tuesday in PNAS.

Brewer and his colleagues estimate that there are about 23 prostitutes for every 100,000 people in America.

A second study, Brewer said, concluded that the average prostitute had 694 male partners a year.

SAFETY

all — the entire way.

"Around campus it's pretty well lit, but the further down the street you get, the darker it seems to get," she said.

At night, she said she tries to avoid walking around, and said she only does so if she feels the lighting is adequate.

Lindsey Penner, sophomore in early childhood specialization, said she usually feels safe in Manhattan, and that the only time she doesn't is when she is alone.

"I feel safe because I always have a roommate that walks with me or takes me to class, so I'm usually never alone," she said. "We usually go in pairs together everywhere, and we make sure we don't go out alone at night."

Though the number of rapes and vehicular burglaries have risen since a year ago this time, Sgt. Lynette Woods of the Riley County Police Department said Manhattan basically is a safe town.

"I feel safe here," she said. "We all feel safe here."

She said the four men arrested almost two weeks ago in connection with a rash of car break-ins was a factor in the large increase of vehicular burglaries. Other factors that contributed to its increase were people leaving their keys in their car, or leaving their cars running while they run inside a store.

Robberies in residential areas and stores are not a big problem in Manhattan, she said.

In regard to the increase in rapes reported, Susan Allen, director of the Women's Center, said it is important to remember that most rapes don't occur as a result of a strangers hiding in the darkness.

"Over 85 percent of rapes on college campuses are acquaintance rape," she said.

Woods said murder in Manhattan is not a large concern.

"It's good this year," she said. "There were three last year, which isn't too bad, but it's three too many."

Woods said the city does take several precautions to help inform and prevent any safety issues.

"We do publicize what we have. We have neighborhood watch, and have different public programs so people should be able to know what's going on in this county," she said.

Woods said she doubted Manhattan's statistics were larger than any city of comparable size.

There are several different actions residents can take, Woods said, that will help decrease someone's chances of being a victim.

Keeping valuables out of sight or in the trunk is a good idea, she said.

"And don't get them out in big crowds," she said.

To help decrease the odds of vehicular burglary or theft, there are several things to do, she said.

"Don't leave cars running while you go into the store," she said.

"When you come back it might be gone. Lock it and keep your keys with you."

Other tips of advice, she said, included parking in well-lit areas, and keeping bicycles chained up, preferably with a combination lock instead of a key lock.

the beginning of the semester so residents can meet people who aren't on their floor.

"It's a great way for others to meet each other. It forces people to take some time and learn a little bit about someone they don't already know," he said.

Konarik said since the game still is going on, she hasn't really met many people, but thinks she will.

"It's really easy to spot people from the hall because they are carrying around water guns," she said. "I will at least recognize faces and maybe meet them later."

met Gladys' girlfriend and we like her very much."

Gerald said he doesn't know how much it would change the situation if Gladys had been an only child, because then the family would have had to deal with not having grandchildren. While they still would have been accepting of her, it may have been harder to deal with the fact that their bloodline wouldn't continue, he said.

The idea of not producing grandchildren for the extenuation of the family could be a source of guilt for someone who is an only child, Gladys said. Still, it is important to realize that being true to one's self takes precedence over pleasing the family.

"At some point we must realize that it is not our obligation to fulfill our parents' dreams and we have to be true to ourselves," she said.

giving state employees the power of choice
People are different, always have been. But these days it seems like our lifestyles are more diverse than ever before. Which means we all have different needs, especially in health care. So instead of a one-size-fits-all health insurance plan that limits your options, why not select a plan that leaves choices up to you? The Preferred Health Systems Insurance Company PPO lets you choose when and where you want to get your health care, who you want to get it from, and you rarely need a referral.
A product of Preferred Health Systems, the same company that offers the popular Preferred Plus of Kansas HMO, our PPO plan gives you open access to the largest provider network in the state, with nearly 4,000 providers across Kansas. You even have the option of using non-network providers if you wish. So how you manage your health care is up to you.
If you want more choice in health plans, make the Preferred choice.

Animal keeper's domain includes entire park

Brian Davoren has been a full-time animal keeper at the Sunset Zoological Park for 3 1/2 years. But, for the past seven, he has been involved with the zoo either volunteering or interning.

"This is one of the jobs you don't get into for the money," he said. "It's because you love the animals."

Working with the animals is what Davoren likes best about his job. He said his love for animals has always been there, but he decided his sophomore year at K-State that he wanted to work at a zoo.

He was at a National Wildlife Society meeting when the curator from Sunset Zoo came to speak. He became interested and signed up to be a part of the volunteer program.

Now, after seven years of involvement, he said his favorite animals to work with are the monkeys and pot-belly pigs. The pigs, he said, are especially fun.

"They're just fun to work with, 'cause of their personalities," he said. "All animals have different personalities, but out of all the animals here, they're the ones closest to being pets."

He said they like to be scratched, wait at the door when they know they're supposed to be fed and go to separate parts of the room to eat.

"They're like dogs," he said. "They say they're pretty much as smart as dogs, so they're pretty interesting characters."

When Davoren first began working full-time at the zoo, he worked strictly with the chimpanzees for three years. Now, his work extends to the entire zoo.

"I wanted to change. I wanted to do it to experience something different, so I could work with all the animals," Davoren said.

His general duties include feeding, watering and cleaning up after the animals. He said he also observes the animals' health, assists veterinarians with physical exams, helps administer medications, creates environment enrichments, makes small repairs to exhibits, facilitates reproduction and does horticulture work.

The worst part of his job, Davoren said, doesn't involve the animals.

working in the COMMUNITY

Who: Brian Davoren
Position: full-time animal keeper at Sunset Zoological Park

"The fact that we have to work on the weekends and on holidays, and working in the extreme heat and cold," he said.

He said when he first begins working with the different animals, they are hesitant to accept him. The chimpanzees, because of their intelligence, were especially cautious to interact with him.

"They play games with you, throw fecal matter at you, spit at you, try to poke you or scratch at you through the bars," he said. "They are probably the worst to get used to."

Other animals, such as the big cats, also try to intimidate new caretakers.

"They will growl and scratch at you to see how you react. Eventually, if you ignore them enough, then they find they don't get a reaction out of you and eventually they stop," Davoren said.

Davoren said he hopes his experience working with all of the animals instead of just one group will help him advance in his career. He said he hopes the experience will one day lead to becoming a curator.

"That's my ultimate goal," he said.

Working in a small zoo will give him many opportunities, Ryan Gulker, general curator, said.

"At a smaller zoo, you get exposed to a wider variety of things," he said.

U.N. attempts to renew talks over Mideast

By LAURA KING
The Associated Press

JERUSALEM — Amid scattered but ugly new outbreaks of violence in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, the U.N. secretary-general appealed Tuesday to Israel and the Palestinians to get back to the bargaining table and end the cycle of killing.

"The region has suffered enough," he said.

President Clinton spoke with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak and Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat by phone, trying to find a proposal for a summit the two sides would accept, amid a diplomatic barrage joined by U.N. chief Kofi Annan, the Russian foreign minister and the European Union security chief.

"We've been working like crazy for the last several days to help do our part. I just have to believe they're not going to let this thing spin out of control," Clinton said in Washington, D.C.

Barak said it was too soon to tell if the relative calm of recent days would hold after a series of ferocious clashes that have left 88 people dead since Sept. 28, most of them Palestinians. The Israeli army issued a statement noting a "significant drop in violent incidents in the West Bank."

But even a lowered level of intensity exacted a terrible toll. At the Gaza Strip town of Rafah, 12-year-old Sami Abu Jazar was declared brain dead after being shot in the head during a stone-throwing clash, hospital officials said.

The army said its troops opened fire after a firebomb was thrown into its outpost, burning a soldier. It expressed sorrow but criticized Palestinians for putting children in harm's way in the clashes.

On the edge of Ramallah, black smoke from burning tires billowed into the air as about 200 Palestinians massed on the road near an Israeli outpost. In a confrontation that lasted hours, protesters hurled stones at Israeli troops, who responded with tear gas and rubber-coated

Student forum to discuss debate

By CHARLIE MORASCH
Kansas State Collegian

An American presidential debate with a twist of British humor will come to K-State.

The second presidential debate between George W. Bush and Al Gore will take place at 8 tonight, and DebateWatch 2000 again will be sponsoring a viewing of the debate. Those attending are asked to come at 7:30 for a briefing of the rules and format of the viewing, which will take place in the UMB Theatre at the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art. The viewing of the debate will be followed by discussion.

This DebateWatch, however, will be different than last week's debate.

"We're going to have the participants respond to the debate in parliamentary fashion," said David Procter, head of the Department of Speech Communication, Theatre and Dance. "We're going to ask people at various times during the debate to shift in their seats from one side of the room to the other to indicate who they think is winning. We call it 'vote with your seat and not your feet', or if you prefer, 'dump the chump with your rump.'"

ELECTIONS 2000

Although the parliamentary style of the debate is new, some participants wonder if it will be accurate.

"I think it's a good idea," Andrew Jones, senior in secondary education, said. "But it might possibly make people shift because of the way other people are shifting."

Procter said that after the debate the DebateWatch theme of education an discussion will continue.

"After the debate, we will again be asking questions about what issues were raised," Procter said. "Did we learn anything new about the candidates based on what we heard? Were there any major mistakes that a candidate made?"

The differences in this debate do not stop with the format of the viewing. The actual debate will have a different format, also.

"Since both candidates are going to be seated at a table, it will be more informal than the first debate," Procter said. "The first one consisted of each person giving a speech, and then they argued about it."

Hearings continue regarding dismissal of former K-State professor

By JESSICA PITTS
Kansas State Collegian

Hearings regarding the dismissal of a former K-State professor, who claims his dismissal is an attack on the tenure policy, will continue Thursday.

Steve Wiest, former associate professor of horticulture, was dismissed in June for "chronic low achievement" after a series of unsatisfactory reviews.

Wiest is contesting the firing at a public grievance hearing that began last week. The hearing will reconvene Thursday with witnesses possibly testifying about a university "hit list," Peter Rombold, Wiest's attorney, said.

The list allegedly contained the names of about 15 tenured faculty members who were targeted for dismissal after 1995.

"There's a lot more at stake here than my client's career," Rombold said at the Oct. 3 hearing.

"This hearing is about tenure and how it must be judiciously honored by the faculty in order to assure that it is not used as a chokehold on freedom."

Wiest claims he was given unfounded subsatisfactory reviews by Tom Warner, head of the Department of Horticulture, and that Warner used the policy on faculty reviews to dismiss him.

The policy, passed by the Faculty Senate and administration in 1996, states that any tenured professor who receives two consecutive unsatisfactory reviews is subjected to dismissal.

Wiest had three, in 1996, 1997 and 1998.

Warner said he was justified in dismissing Wiest because of his lack of productivity on performance standards.

Those standards include how often a professor's work is published, how much grant and research funding he brings in to the university and their work with graduate students.

Before his dismissal, Wiest was reassigned from teaching to full-time plant research, with Wiest's approval, Warner said.

Warner told the hearing panel he took Wiest out of the classroom in 1992, partly as a result of student complaints.

"I had a number of grad students coming in and saying he wasn't meeting classes and not satisfied with his efforts," Warner said.

Warner also denies that he and other university administrators ever prepared a "hit list."

"I don't have a hit list, and I never have," he said.

"That is just nonsense."

Warner, however, said he keeps a list of people in the department that he needs to work with, but he said that is common procedure.

"It should in no way be compared to a 'hit list,'" he said.

Local woman arrested for counterfeit money

A Manhattan woman was arrested Monday afternoon for using counterfeit $20 bills.

Sheri Fleener, 36, was arrested on charges of forgery, possession of methamphetamine and possession of drug paraphernalia.

Sgt. Connie Miller of the Riley County Police Department said they received reports over the weekend that someone in the Manhattan area was using counterfeit bills.

"There were three businesses in the Manhattan area in which the bills were used," Miller said.

There were $180 worth of counterfeit bills being used in the area. Miller said she did not know what specific businesses the bills were used at.

Jacque Ebert, junior in marketing and employee of Sunflower Bank, said there are many ways to tell if a bill is counterfeit, but new bills introduced in the past few years help to cut down on counterfeit bills.

"The new bills have been made counterfeit-proof," Ebert said. "The faces on the bills are bigger and moved to the side, there are watermarks on the right side of most of the bills and there is a strip down the center of the bills as an added security feature."

Fleener's bond was set at $3,000. Miller said the case will be forwarded to the county attorney to investigate further charges.

Sewer trench collapses, kills worker under soil

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — A construction worker died when a sewer trench collapsed on him, burying him under hundreds of pounds of compacted clay soil.

Michael Scott Thomas, 25, was buried Monday morning at the construction site in Kansas City. He was pronounced dead shortly after 3:30 p.m., about 3 1/2 hours after fire crews began rescue efforts, but his body had not been recovered as of late Monday night.

After the collapse, construction workers dug for 10 minutes, and then used a backhoe to take out large scoops of mud from the 12-foot-deep trench. They found an air pocket and pushed a rod toward Thomas.

Co-worker John Moreland said rescuers were able to see a pant leg, but were unable to get Thomas out.

Because of the Columbus Day holiday, officials from the Occupational Safety and Health Administration, who investigate such accidents, were not immediately available for comment but were on the scene late Monday.

Brad Humston, a spokesman for the Kansas City Fire Department, said Thomas and a co-worker were connecting a sewer line for a new home. Thomas was working at the bottom of the trench and the co-worker was on top when the wall caved in.

Humston said he had been around many similar construction sites and the walls of sewer line trenches rarely were reinforced before plumbing crews worked in them.

Top Firestone executive steps down from position

NASHVILLE, Tenn. — The top executive of Bridgestone/Firestone Inc. stepped down Tuesday, two months after millions of Firestone tires were recalled because of safety concerns.

Chairman and CEO Masatoshi Ono did not attend a news conference announcing the management change, but this week said his retirement was not linked to the recall of 6.5 million tires. The 63-year-old Ono instead cited health problems and his age.

Ono will return to Japan and remain on the board of directors for parent Bridgestone Corp. His successor, executive vice president John Lampe, takes over the embattled company immediately.

Lampe said it will come back strong from the recall.

"We know that many people, not just in the United States but around the world, are questioning our integrity and the safety of our tires, and we know that we can't blame anyone else for the loss of faith in Firestone products — not our customers, not our business partners," he said.

Yoichiro Kaizaki, president of Tokyo-based Bridgestone, said Lampe enjoys the trust of the 35,000 employees at Firestone.

Ono joined Bridgestone in 1959 and headed the U.S. operations based in Nashville for seven years.

Reports of his departure have circulated since the August recall of Firestone's ATX, ATX II and Wilderness tires, which have been linked to 101 deaths in the United States and more than 50 overseas. The company has come under heavy criticism for its handling of the recall.

During a day-long deposition Monday — part of several consumer lawsuits filed against Bridgestone/Firestone and Ford Motor Co. — Ono said he told Kaizaki in September that he would like to retire "because I will be turning 64 next year and I didn't feel I was in particularly good health, either."

The National Highway Traffic Safety Administration has issued a consumer advisory on 1.4 million more Firestone tires considered potentially unsafe and opened an investigation into the Steeltex brand.

Kansas hunting season draws thousands of out-of-staters

By JESSICA LEDUC
Kansas State Collegian

With fall approaching, thousands of people will be streaming into Kansas with one thing on their minds — hunting.

"Kansas probably gets about 35,000-40,000 out-of-state hunters," said Bob Mathews, chief of information and education for the Kansas Department of Wildlife and Parks.

With so many people coming into the state to hunt, it is important to know when seasons start and where licenses can be picked up.

Mathews said one of the most popular seasons is pheasant, which coincides with quail season.

Pheasant season is Nov. 11 to Jan. 31. The quail season is divided into two separate zones, with the eastern zone starting Nov. 11, and the western zone starting Nov. 18. Both eastern and western zone seasons end Jan. 31.

Other game bird seasons include dove and prairie chicken. Dove season is Sept. 1 to Oct. 30.

Mathews said Kansas is famous for its prairie chicken population. This season is divided into three different phases. Hunting is legal east of U.S. Highway 281 from Sept. 15 to Oct. 15. Hunters may hunt anywhere except the southwest part of the state Nov. 4 to Jan. 31. From Dec. 1 to Jan. 31, the southwest part of the state is open for prairie chicken hunting.

Hunters need to acquire an annual hunting permit to hunt these types of game. These licenses can be purchased from all wildlife department offices, online at www.kdwp.state.ks.us, the county clerk's office at the Riley County Courthouse or at several private businesses.

Businesses in the Manhattan area that sell fish and game licenses include Alco, Derrick's Bait and Tackle, De Dee's 66, Mini-Marts, Wal-Mart, both Dillons stores and Kmart.

"We offer regular basic hunting licenses, which you have to have to hunt anything," said Heather Adcock, sporting goods employee at Wal-Mart.

Sue Seitz, account clerk at the Riley County Clerk's Office, said hunters must have a valid hunters safety card or number to obtain any license.

"When they sign the license, they are saying that they have all of that," Seitz said.

Hunter education certification is required for any hunter born on or after July 1, 1957. The certification is required to purchase a hunting license and to hunt.

"Hunters must complete a hunters safety course to hunt in Kansas," Mathews said. "It's generally required for any hunter."

While game birds are popular in Kansas, Mathews said deer are becoming an equally popular attraction for hunters.

Tad Tweady, from Junction City, said he enjoys hunting deer because the animals are so smart.

"You are one on one with the creature," Tweady said. "They are smarter than you, and it's fun to outsmart them, and you learn from your mistakes."

There are several different seasons and methods of hunting deer. From Nov. 29 to Dec. 10, hunters may shoot deer with regular firearms. The archery season is Oct. 2 to Nov. 28 and Dec. 11 to 31. Hunters with muzzle loader guns may hunt deer Nov. 29 to Dec. 10. There is a special season Jan. 10 to 14, for hunters who did not harvest a deer during the regular seasons.

Hunters must purchase a deer license in addition to the annual hunting license. For residents of Kansas, bow-hunting licenses can be purchased over the counter.

Businesses in the Manhattan area that offer these types of permits are Ole' Mike's Shooter Supply, Sharps, the County Clerk's office, Tuttle Creek Wildlife Park and Wal-Mart.

For hunters wanting to hunt deer with firearms, the application deadline for permits was July 14. Applications sent into the Pratt Wildlife and Park office were drawn from a lottery. Hunters still can apply for the leftover doe permits at the Pratt office.

A secondary permit option is also available. Hunters who already have acquired a deer permit may purchase another one from the local vendors. These permits are sold through Jan. 13.

Matt Brookshire, owner of Manhattan Performance Archery Club, said deer season is his favorite season.

"I like being outdoors," Brookshire said. "It's better than sitting at home playing Nintendo."

The Fort Riley area offers hunters an original hunting option — elk.

Sixty-five permits were issued to hunters during the 2000-2001 season. The application deadline to file for an elk-hunting permit was July 14. The various hunting seasons are Oct. 1-March 15, 2001, but might be altered because of training exercises.

"It's a limited hunt," Mathews said. "Relatively few permits are issued because it's such a limited resource."

One of the most important things a hunter needs on a hunt is blaze-orange clothing, which reduces the risk of being shot by another hunter.

All firearm deer hunters and those accompanying them are required to wear a minimum of 200 square inches of orange clothing, 100 that is visible from the back and 100 that is visible from the front.

Hunters should be responsible with privileges

Hunting has always been a favorite pastime for many Kansans. Around 35,000 to 40,000 of those who are not originally from the sunflower state flock here for the purpose of the game.

However, along with the hunting weapons comes responsibility.

Participants must have a valid hunter safety card or number to obtain any license. There also is a hunter education certification required for those born on or after July 1, 1957.

A large part of that responsibility is safety. Hunters need to be careful even when they are not out in the wide-open land.

Tuesday in Kansas City, Mo., an 18-year-old man allegedly was trying to repair a rifle when it fired, shooting a bullet through the wall that killed his friend's 49-year-old mother. She literally was a victim of the game.

This is a tragedy that could have been avoided.

Every year fatal accidents occur that could have been prevented, mistakes that even the most avid, experienced hunters make as well as rookies who are new to the sport.

Hunters need to use extra precaution during this season.

READERS WRITE

Erasing Democrats' message reflects poorly on Republicans

Editor,

This Sunday, on a walk to Hale Library, I noticed a sidewalk chalk message, which is not uncommon on campus.

This particular one read, "Young Democrats meeting" and gave the room number, etc. The problem was, someone had scratched out the "Democrat" as best they could with, most likely, their shoe.

I was disappointed that someone would do such a thing, especially to something so mundane as a meeting announcement. Are Democrats not allowed to meet on campus? It's not like someone wrote, "Democrats rule!!"

I can understand scratching out "Nebraska Fan Club Meeting," but Young Democrats? I myself am a Democrat, but I think I'd be just as mad (and surprised) if someone had scratched out "Republicans." This isn't a football game or sports rivalry, it's politics. I'd think there would be enough respect between parties to avoid stupid acts such as this.

I was getting upset last week when the advertisements for the life chain were chalked every 10 feet, and the fetuses drawn alongside pro-life statements, but I didn't go scratching them out with my foot.

Last I checked, it's OK to write anything on the K-State sidewalks, be it meeting announcements or opinions. The wrestling club didn't go scratching out the swimming club meeting announcements, did they?

This close to election time, are the Republicans on campus that worried about George W. Bush's chance that they feel they must stymie the Democratic influence on campus?

K-State should recognize its distinct position as having a Republican majority amongst students on campus. College campuses are a breeding ground for Democrats and liberal thinking — that's why K-State is special for it's Republican population.

Whoever scratched it out was incredibly immature and unfortunately sent out a message about Republicans on campus for me. The argument can be made that it was a "random scratching," or maybe the person who did it wasn't a Republican. I highly doubt it was either circumstance, although we all know the anti-Democrat sentiment among campus wildlife — maybe it was one of them. I'll look for blue chalk rabbit tracks.

It's too easy to get lost in the depths of despair; the real challenge lies in

Climbing OUT

KEN WELLS

It's funny how what unites us can keep us so far apart.

I was not always the jolly, gregarious sprite you know now. OK, that's facetious. Anyone who knows me knows I have the social skills of a rusty chainsaw going full throttle. I don't attend parties — no, I've been told I "haunt" them. They said this as if it weren't a compliment; maybe I should leave the scythe at home next time. On my good days I'm bitter and angry; on my bad days I'll claw through a drive-through to strangle the heathen who insists "the shake machine is broken" in a hopeless voice like it was a piece of 30th-century equipment or on loan from NASA.

No, I used to be worse. True story. I spent a month in bed, never going further than the end of the hallway. I ate oatmeal and, when I could keep it down, ramen noodles. I drank warm Kool-Aid. I kept my windows barricaded against light. I was, for all intents and purposes, beaten. I'd run out of reasons to keep trying.

I waited to be missed; I wasn't, and that didn't help. The loneliness and despair fed on itself, and I just folded inside myself until I disappeared.

Why? There was a veritable cornucopia of reasons really — your basic Sears catalog of emotional afflictions — each a little shard of darkness inside, working and digging its way deeper, until one particularly vile and jagged shard finally hit home and I couldn't keep up the defenses anymore. I shattered. I surrendered. Good thing nobody was around to hear it.

I wasn't suicidal; no, nothing that assertive. I just wanted to stop being. It was the only way I could stop the dull throb of existence that just crushed me. And I wished so very hard that it would just happen.

To be honest, sometimes I look back and wonder if I didn't really die, then, in that bed. Maybe the person who entered my room in September never left, and maybe the person who emerged in October never saw the world before. Maybe this is my third life. I feel an odd distance from that Ken-of-old, like from a character in some particularly sadistic author's melodrama.

But I usually remember that it was still me. There's still some icy shrapnel left in my chest. A couple of gentle betrayals, some simple oversights magnified by time and distance, mere slights exaggerated by ego — I still feel the slivers in here when it gets cold.

There were days, before I fell apart, when I was doing everything I could to maintain this posture of normalcy. When I couldn't care less about anything I ever did or happened to me, when everything simply equaled pain in the end anyhow. I knew — not thought, but knew — that I was a void, an aberration, outside of every conceivable loop, and that I would not be missed. And one day the scales just tipped. It's not that there weren't enough reasons to keep on going, it's every reason I'd ever had was all gone. Every single one.

And while it was all falling apart, I could hear it crumble. That was the strangest part. I remember, back in preschool, becoming self-aware, the first moment I thought my own narration in my head, over a redheaded girl named Kimberly. But I was withdrawing — feeling never more alone than when with others, always shut off, walled away, locked up just behind my face, and my narration began to echo; could not feel the romance or catch the spark. And I remember when my narration started to scream, a scream that lasted day and night and grew louder for months until I finally shut down, and then it just fell silent and I was a stringless puppet.

I say this and I wish it was unique. The more I know people, though, I know better.

So many of the people I acquaint myself with, even those rare few I call friends, or the elite I actually admire or hold in esteem — they know this, not because they're empathetic, but because they've been down this road before. It's not a big roll of the dice to assume you have too, to one extent of another.

There are degrees, of course, from a few seconds of simple despair to months or years of withdrawal, isolation and futility. But that first realization, that jolt when you realize that your mind is not entirely under your own control, that you — if only for a moment — might be your own nemesis or undoing, that burns a scar on your soul.

But that scar is completely invisible. We cannot recognize each other, whoever we are. Some of us will never admit it. And worse, when I was at my worst, I could never tolerate company. I wanted someone to try to help, just so I could reject it, because it made me feel wanted and kept me away from interference. I remember screaming in my mind, "I don't want your help, but I just want you to try." We are poor company for each other, sometimes.

It's been a long time since I've looked down the barrel of my own uselessness. I think I've gotten more egotistical or just plain stupid. And I'm lucky. I can't quite explain how I got to where I am now. (Long story involving Columbus, Ohio, Larry Bird and "Men in Black," the movie. Maybe later.) Point is I got here, and it still boggles my mind. Karma plays one hell of a transition game, but I like to capitalize on turnovers, so I'm running with the ball now.

Every day from that point on has been a gift. I don't deserve any of it; I gave up my right to it all several years ago. But I'm going to take it because I want it, and I can't believe I can actually say that now.

Sometimes the darkness comes back, like a lost pet, and I greet it now, because I know that I own it, not vice-versa, not anymore. It's part of me, and I'll use it, because that's the kinda guy I am. (I sic it on schoolchildren walking by. Now that's entertainment.)

The reasons that bring us to our own vanishing point are our own. It's not a matter of the "why?" it's the "why not?" And often it's a matter of being on the brink, demanding an answer — Why me? Why go on? Is it even worth it?

My answers now — "it's everyone, you self-centered git," "because you still have a part to play," and "oh, you have no idea" — would have fallen false to me wrapped up in bed years ago. And the assurances — "I know what it's like," even "I lived through it, you dolt" — don't work.

Each darkness is as specific as a fingerprint, a whorling maze we've got to maneuver, often alone.

Liberation, awakening was something I had to look for, fight for, bite at and gouge for before I cherished it, before it was really mine. I know, sounds religious, doesn't it? Almost was. But no gift can ever be as important as that which I eventually wanted enough to look for.

I wish there was an answer I could give everyone who knows what I'm talking about. I wish I could end the column snappily: "just close your eyes and sing the opening of 'Hooked on a Feeling' at the top of your lungs." But that's too stupid for even me.

Someone once said (quick, name that movie) "Every man's got a devil, and you can't rest until you find him," and if you make that gender-equitable, I fully believe that. Hell, I embody that. (I used to be Putnam Hall's collective devil; you can't imagine the dent in my schedule, though.) There were people waiting, wanting to help me, but I had to let them — and first, I had to help myself.

This campus has resources to assist those who might find themselves in similar mindsets to mine of years ago — if you want them, use them, for God's sake, it's why they're there. Or if you want, any friend worth the name will be willing to listen to you, and you might find they have an insight into your situation.

Obviously, I'll personally understand if you choose to make the walk alone; that's just the way my path unwound. But please realize — you don't have to.

K-State's 'trendy' label indicative of students' growing conformity

RICK WOOTEN

Jeans and a T-shirt. The Sunday paper. Watching "Friends" on a Thursday night.

While familiarity with certain things gives the human psyche a needed sense of security, we as people must strive to never forget the importance of good old-fashioned originality.

Students at K-State recently were informed that they were attending one of the trendiest schools in the nation.

Administrators might claim it has everything to do with the fact that we have friendly faculty and improving facilities, but I believe it has something to do with the fact that success and recognition on the part of the football team is bringing more students to our campus.

Regardless of why more people are coming to K-State than ever before, the mere use of the word "trendy" should alarm all of us who value individual personal expression above fitting in with the crowd.

Marketing executives at The Gap have successfully established khakis in the greek system, and plenty of seemingly normal people have "dropped" their cars in some sort of an effort to appear more "urban" (even though their Johnson County license plates contradict this). Even Willie the Wildcat had to adapt to look more like his Powercat counterpart. The list could go on and on.

Maybe I am completely mistaken, and originality itself is the concept that is old-fashioned. But I am disappointed in the belief that people can be labeled because they are not earmarked by an "Old Navy" or "Abercrombie" logo emblazoned on the front of their sweatshirt.

I got into a scuffle last year because some overly confident chap at Rusty's Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon felt it necessary to belittle my clothes that he assumed I bought at Wal-Mart. Sorry, "Tommy Hil," but I find it a bit overboard to pay $35 for a T-shirt when I can buy one at "Wally-World" for $4.64. I won the battle and the war.

As stated earlier, the world of trendiness spreads its wings farther than the realm of clothes.

How many vehicles sport an "Oakley" sticker on the rear window? Those people must be proud of their $150 pieces of plastic. I, too, fell into the trendy trap back in junior high, but after the second pair of sunglasses broke, I decided to just wear a Pepe Jeans hat that was just as trendy, but at a fraction of the price.

Even some of our own Collegian columnists have failed in the responsibility of original writing. The fun of the morning paper is ruined by the repetitiveness of people who must be obsessed.

One might hypothesize that these fixations are the result of a subconscious attraction that these writers may have on their subjects, both on an emotional and physical level. I, myself, feel sympathy for any of the persons in question.

Originators of trends are the only ones who deserve respect in their advanced choices. Medals of honor should go to the first person who turned a hat around backwards, wrote about an original subject or drove a red Honda Civic with gold wheels.

Cheers to originators like Ken Wells who writes something new every week, Flavor Flav for his big clock necklace and Don Johnson for showing us that suits can be worn with T-shirts (even ones from Wal-Mart).

Everyone else is just a follower. They are pawns in the game of hype; no more mature than 10-year-olds who buy Pokemon cards.

Dance recognizes financial patron of Fiedler Hall

Cory Lafferty, senior in computer engineering, has danced with the person responsible for more than $7 million in donations to K-State. He said Alice Fiedler's personality, though, affected him most.

"When we were out there dancing, she told me her two passions were dancing and driving her car," Lafferty, Engineering Student Council president, said. "It's like your ideal grandma."

Their recent dance was shared at the Fiedler Hall and Library Dedication Dance on Sept. 9. Fiedler's gift helped fund a 75,000-square-foot addition to Fiedler Hall.

Gary Hellebust, KSU Foundation president, said the donation made Fiedler the university's top donor.

Lafferty said he hopes Fiedler has set a standard that future contributors will follow. Her donation, he said, will help increase enrollment and faculty salaries in the College of Engineering.

Alice Fiedler stands in the atrium of Durland Hall. Fiedler has contributed half the cost of expansion of the engineering complex.

"She's done a great job getting the ball rolling," Lafferty said.

Fiedler has donated $5.3 million to K-State so far, but will leave the remaining funds in her trust. She said this money will be used for high school scholarships, faculty salaries and the College of Engineering's future needs.

"I'm just happy I could do what I did," Fiedler said. "The money will be there for them to use."

Fiedler, who now resides in St. Petersburg, Fla., lived in Lawrence for about three years. Her husband, George Fiedler, graduated from K-State in 1926 and earned his professional degree in 1934. They were married for 59 years.

At K-State, George Fiedler was a member of the Pi Kappa Phi fraternity. Fiedler said her husband enjoyed his experience at the university.

"Many times he spoke of K-State and wanted to repay them for the education it gave him," she said. "He had a very fine engineering career."

George Fiedler designed machinery and controls for the first automatic window glass manufacturing plant. He also taught electrical engineering at Berkeley College.

College of Engineering Dean Terry King said George Fiedler was nominated as Fellow in five engineering societies. He also was named to the KSU Engineering Hall of Fame.

The construction of Fiedler Hall and Library will bring the size of the Engineering Complex to 275,000 square feet. Fiedler said the building exceeded her expectations.

"I'm so surprised to find it as large as it is," she said. "It's as beautiful on the inside as it is the outside."

Fiedler contributed nearly half of the funding required to build the $12 million structure, King said. The remaining amount was acquired through state funding. Corporate and individual donations furnished the building.

King said the new addition will help the College of Engineering reach its goal of being the best engineering school in the United States. He said student scholarships and monetary rewards for deserving faculty members will promote a high level of achievement within the college.

"Care gifts like that enable us to enhance the academic excellence of the college," he said. "Alice Fiedler has allowed us to make big steps towards realizing that vision."

Donald Rathbone, dean emeritus of Engineering, said Fiedler's generosity will result in future benefits for the university and state.

"I simply want to make sure that the college and university, as well, appreciates all Alice Fiedler has done for us," he said.

Professor's book chronicles history through obituaries

By JAMIE BARRETT
Kansas State Collegian

Reading 8,000 obituaries is not something that just anyone would do.

For Janice Hume, assistant professor of journalism and mass communications, researching obituaries in American culture was a huge part of her life for nearly two years.

"I began my research on obituaries at the University of Missouri during my dissertation work," Hume said. "I got very interested in them and how people were perceived in early American culture."

Hume's interest in obituaries turned into something much larger. Over the summer, her research was published in her first book, "Obituaries in American Culture." Hume said the publishing of her book was amazing for her.

"Once people start reading obituaries, they are fascinated by them," she said. "One thing I was fascinated by in my research is how people were fixated on being heroes in early times."

Hume said her book is an explanation and compilation of some of the most interesting and insightful obituaries she has come across.

"Obituaries are much more than a news story about how someone died," Hume said. "They are a commemoration and tell what was valuable about that person's life."

Hume said she found that many of the obituaries she read compared the deceased person's life to the life of an American hero.

"Some of the obituaries I read from the early 1800s compared the person's life to heroes like Daniel Boone and the pioneers," she said.

Hume researched three points in history: she focused on the Jacksonian era, the Civil War era and the suffrage era. Hume said she discovered huge changes in obituary writing between the centuries.

"The ways they referred to death in the 1800s were silly and goofy," Hume said. "They would use vivid imagery such as, 'She was removed by the destroying angel.'"

Hume said women frequently were identified in their obituaries by what the men in their lives had achieved.

"How neat a woman kept her house was normally written about in her obituary," Hume said. "She was also identified in relation to husbands, sons or fathers."

Obituaries are an important insight into changes in American culture, Hume said.

"It is important how we remember someone in our society," she said. "It is very interesting how things we remember people for change over time."

Betty Winfield, professor of journalism and political science at the University of Missouri, worked with Hume as she completed her dissertation work.

"Janice's work is the first such American studies research," Winfield said. " She got so involved that we called her 'the obit queen.'"

Tanya Barrientos, contributing editor for the Philadelphia Inquirer's Sunday magazine and a friend of Hume's, said obituaries do not fall into the conventional rules of journalism but are equally important in representing society.

"Janice's book shows how those things that we value in human beings has changed with the times," Barrientos said.

Barrientos said she remembered the long process Hume went through to complete her work.

"I accompanied her once while she did some work at the library," she said. "We went into the rare books section and there she was, wearing white gloves so she wouldn't damage the old documents, digging and digging through piles of obituaries."

Hume said her research interested her to the end and she hopes others find her book just as intriguing.

"I think research on obituaries interests journalists quite a bit, but I hope other people become as interested," Hume said. "Now, I am going to move on to something new."

Shadrack Kimeli runs along side cross country teammate Jean-Paul Niyongabo at K-State's only home meet of the season at Warner Park.

Leading the pack

Senior, junior guide young cross country team

By JASON ARY
Kansas State Collegian

To senior cross-country runner Jean-Paul Niyongabo, the statement, "With hard work and dedication, results will show" is far more than a morale booster, it's a personal belief.

Niyongabo, along with junior Shadrack Kimeli, have become the de facto leaders of a cross country team that, with its large contingent of underclassmen, is relatively inexperienced.

NEXT ACTION

Kimeli and Niyongabo, with the rest of the cross country team, will see competition again when they travel to Ames, Iowa, on Saturday to compete in the Pre-NCAA Invitational.

Cross country coach Randy Cole said that while the team is young, many factors are giving the younger teammates experience and knowledge.

"The accumulation of work, experience and training have taught the team a lot," Cole said. "Niyongabo and Kimeli's presence have helped greatly as well. They are our frontrunners, and I'm looking for the other guys to close the gap."

Both Niyongabo and Kimeli said that as the season has progressed, so has the performance of the team.

"So far, so good," Niyongabo said. "This team has improved a lot, and I'm really looking forward to the rest of the season. If the team keeps improving like it has, it will go far."

Kimeli also shares Niyongabo's stance on the team's performance so far this year.

"The team is simply getting better with more and more experience," he said.

Both Kimeli and Niyongabo have racked up many of the best individual times for the Wildcats over the past two seasons.

Kimeli was named Big 12 runner of the week after posting the best individual time at the Wichita State Gold Classic in early September, before going on to notch his second consecutive individual victory at the Woody Greeno Invitational in Lincoln, Neb. So far, Kimeli posted the best individual time in five different meets.

Cole said he is very impressed with the training regiment and devotion Kimeli has shown.

"Shadrack is really the workhorse and the motivator," Cole said. "He's very dedicated to school and to his training — he just keeps on getting better."

Niyongabo, K-State's top point scorer last year, has several victories to his credit as well, including the 1999 Maple Leaf Invitational and Woody Greeno Invitational. Niyongabo then went on to compete in the Big 12 Championship, finishing 10th, before qualifying for the NCAA Championships. So far this season, he's continued such success, finishing in the top 5 at several meets.

"He's a very pleasant person," Cole said of Niyongabo. "He's still maturing racewise, but he is training well and I can really see him getting better."

Cole said like the two have been great inspirations to each other, and that their bond runs deeper than just cross-country.

"With both of them being from east Africa, I really feel like there's a sort of kinsmenship between the two," Cole said.

"They want to go out and beat one another, but they really don't have a big rivalry between themselves."

Niyongabo said he agrees that he and Kimeli share a close bond.

"He's my brother here. We think the same way; we believe the same things. We both have the same vision, that we have to train, we have to get things done," Niyongabo said.

However, getting things done doesn't come easy for the the two veterans. The day often begins as early as 5:30 a.m. to squeeze in their first practice of the day before most students have time to hit the snooze button. After wrapping up their daily regimen of classes, they often have another practice in the late afternoon before heading home to hit the books and finish up their homework.

MATT STAMEY/Collegian

Junior cross country runner Shadrack Kimeli runs down Marlatt Avenue on Sept. 25.

"It is such a commitment, and it makes such a long day for us," Niyongabo said. "Morning, afternoon, sometimes even night, it's hard to get used to it, but you finally get into a groove and it's not so bad."

Kimeli said while the daily training regiment often varies, it's always intense and extensive.

"Sometimes, we run lightly for three minutes, then medium for three, then hard for three, and repeat it all over again, or sometimes we'll just go run seven miles."

With a majority of the conditioning taking place outdoors, Kimeli expressed some displeasure on the dropping temperatures.

"I really don't like winter at all, it's too cold," he said. "We don't stay indoors. Recently it was too hot, now it's getting cold — it doesn't matter — we still run outdoors."

K-State meets Buffs tonight in Manhattan

By MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

Colorado's volleyball team is a bit of an enigma.

The Buffs, K-State's opponent tonight at Ahearn Field House, seem to excel at hitting. Three players, sophomore Kim Taskey, junior Sonja Nielson and freshman Monique Gerlach, average more than three kills per game.

However, Colorado has struggled at times to keep the ball in play, and only Gerlach has hit for more than 16 percent.

K-STATE

VS.
COLORADO
(7-7, 3-4)
Tonight at 7 in Ahearn Field House

In that same manner, Colorado has shown that on-again, off-again play against other Big 12 teams, losing at home to Baylor and then winning on the road at Texas Tech three days later.

The result is that Colorado's offense is tough to decipher, K-State head coach Jim McLaughlin said.

"They do some nice things. Why are they hitting for low percentages?" he said. "I don't know except for maybe unforced errors. They have talented players, and they're good in a lot of positions. It's hard to figure out why they're not always good."

What McLaughlin said he does know is that Colorado is playing well right now, especially after beating then-No. 24 Texas Tech.

"That's a big win, and that gives them some confidence," he said. "They've been kind of hot and cold, but right now they're hot. So we've got to expect them to play well, because they will."

Part of the reason the Buffs have struggled is because they have a new setter, Elizabeth Gower, directing the team. Like the rest of the squad, she has struggled at times but also played well against Texas Tech.

Gower is young, but K-State won't take her lightly, especially the players near the net, middle blocker Kelle Branting said.

"I think she's a pretty good setter. She's real accurate, and they like to set the middle a lot," she said.

K-State has had its own share of players who have struggled with consistency. Against Oklahoma on Saturday, for instance, freshman middle blocker Lauren Goehring, who had been playing well, hit for a negative 28.6 percent.

To play their best, the Cats need better play from Goehring, McLaughlin said.

"She was rolling at such a high rate, and she just was a little bit off-beat. You expect that from a freshman, but I don't expect that from her," he said. "I think our middles should always be good. And she's not really a freshman anymore. We're almost halfway through this thing."

However, it should be realized that Oklahoma's defense worked very hard to shut Goehring down, setter Disney Bronnenberg said.

"They were really worried about her, and it allowed us to open up some other hitters that we probably couldn't have if it hadn't been for her," Bronnenberg said.

As a result, the Cats' line-up has changed three times in the last three games, with senior Julie Thomas most recently cracking the starting list.

While the varying line-ups do show depth at some positions, McLaughlin said he wants to set a starting six in the immediate future.

"We still have yet to put the line-up on the floor that we think is 'the line-up,' but when you join a team, contributions change along the way," he said, "and as long as you're united and are a team, it all evens out. But we just can't wait until we can put a line-up out there and go with it."

Denial of varsity status adds fuel to women's soccer club's fire

By DAN SMITH
Kansas State Collegian

Some members of the K-State athletics community were delighted by an April 21 announcement.

"The tough decision was not to add a sport, but what sports not to add," K-State Athletics Director Max Urick, said. "For K-State's needs at this point in time, equestrian is the best fit for the university."

However, on a day when Urick said the university was "extremely excited" to add the new sport, other members of the student body, including many on the university's women's soccer club, were anything but excited with Urick's decision.

"It was the easy way out for him," team vice president Jill Shehi said regarding Urick's assessment of K-State's athletic needs.

Junior Jane Welters said she didn't understand the athletics director's reasoning behind the choice, either.

HOPEFUL REBOUND

The Cats are at the halfway point in their season and look to rebound from a 1-4 start by finishing strong in their final five games:

Sunday @ Wichita State
Oct. 22 vs. Wichita State
Oct. 28 vs. Washburn
Nov. 5 @ Nebraska
Nov. 12 @ Washburn

"We have really good players, and I didn't understand why he didn't pick us," Welters said. "I would like to see us become a varsity sport, we just need Max to notice us."

Welters said many potential high school recruits contact her inquiring about varsity soccer opportunities at K-State.

"A lot more girls would play with scholarships," Welters, team president, said. "People e-mail me and send letters, but all I can offer them is the club program."

Because K-State has not yet recognized the club as a varsity sport, many supporters of the program said the school has missed out on some of the nations brightest young soccer stars, fifth-year player Janet Rhodes said.

"There's a lot of people that want to play soccer here at K-State," she said. "It's kind of heart-wrenching to say to them, 'Sorry, they didn't choose us.'"

When the decision was made to exclude the women's soccer club from consideration for varsity status, Urick gave the team various reasons for the move, including the lack of fan and athletic bases, but to many on the team, the reasons were unfounded.

"That's just completely ridiculous," Shehi, junior in criminal justice, said. "Being the only school in the Big 12 without a varsity team is embarrassing."

Despite the absence of varsity status and a 1-4 start this season, the team remains determined to rebuild and play out the rest of the season with dedication, Shehi said.

There is plenty of talent for the Wildcats, but the unity and communication that the team has lacked to this point in the season

Victory over No. 8 Oklahoma pivotal for respect of football team

RICH SMITH

I'm not usually much for hyperbole.

Maybe I paid $49.95 to view one too many of Mike Tyson's 38-second "fights of the century." Perhaps it's the embarrassment of the grass roots "Bob Hamelin for Baseball Hall of Fame" campaign I started in 1994. Or maybe it was that time in junior high when I told my friends Calbert Cheaney was the greatest player in college basketball history, "hands down."

I've learned painfully over the years that few people or events, particularly in the sporting realm, are as great or important as they purport to be.

I've grown to require a lot of proof before heaping spoonfuls of sugary praise on such things. Yes, I've learned better than to do what I'm about to do. But I'm going to do it anyway. Here goes. ...

Saturday's game against Oklahoma might just be the most important in K-State history.

There — it's out. May God have mercy on my soul, it's not a typo. And no, I haven't forgotten about Nebraska, so Husker fans, no misspelled e-mails, please. Your chance to be irrate comes next month. In the meantime, K-State has a more important task at hand. Why? Here are two good reasons:

The attitude

Oklahoma just begs to be hated, especially by a team (and fan base) like K-State's. Think of OU as Keyshawn Johnson to K-State's Wayne Chrebet. The upstart Sooners seem to have achieved in barely one year a level of national respect and attention that K-State has toiled to build for the past 10.

The Sooners are built in the image of their coach, Bob Stoops. They're brash, flashy and successful.

A former K-State assistant, Stoops' raid of K-State's coaching staff to stock his own, coupled with several verbal parting shots at Bill Snyder this summer, tucks him in between Hitler and Tom Asbury on the hateability scale for most Wildcat fans.

The history and relationships between the two teams are an enormous draw. Oh, to be a fly on the locker room wall this weekend — it's as though Bill Snyder has been plopped down in the middle of an episode of "Melrose Place." It's a fascinating, intense matchup on every level.

How will K-State manage to contain that maddening OU offense and quarterback Josh Heupel?

For that matter, what magic tricks will Snyder unveil in his chess match with OU defensive coordinator Mike Stoops, a former K-State assistant?

Which team will have the psychological edge — the Sooners, looking to entrench themselves among the elite, or the Wildcats, looking for revenge against their departed coaches?

No. 2 vs. No. 8. the state of Kansas vs. the state of Oklahoma. Snyder vs. Stoops. Upstart vs. uh ... another upstart. It's one of the juiciest matchups I can recall — so much so that we just might someday point back to this game as the beginning of a fierce OU/K-State rivalry.

The respect

After enduring an unusually high level of media condescension during their annual game of non-conference whack-a-mole, the Wildcats finally seem to have turned a corner. ESPN "College Gameday" will be here on Saturday. So will ABC. The sunshine of national attention is beaming down on us, and it feels warm indeed.

But make no mistake, friends, the spotlight is pointed toward Manhattan on a strictly provisional basis. Win, and K-State gets legitimacy, and more than a single highlight on "SportsCenter." Lose, and we spend the rest of the season carpooling to work with the Alabamas and Texases of the world ("Say, didn't you used to be a national title contender?")

The past few years, Nebraska has been K-State's annual "respect game." The enormity of the matchup has undermined its legitimacy. K-State has had few other chances to cut their teeth against top ten-caliber competition. National observers look at a K-State win over the Huskers and say "Well, they ought to win — it's the only big game on their schedule."

Elite matchups like Saturday's are a routine for top programs. If K-State proves it can handle the test skillfully, it will heat up the Wildcats' currently tepid pool of national respect. Just imagine — respect, and a win over a top-10 team. That would really give us something to talk about when the Nebraska game rolls around.

should be among the team's premiere goals for the five remaining games in 2000, Welters said.

"We're a talented team," she said, "but we don't work well with each other. There are 25 of us, each with different playing styles, and right now we're trying to unite."

Shehi said this year's team is taking the right steps to do just that in becoming a top-notch soccer program, as illustrated by the lofty goals that she holds for the remainder of the Cats' season.

"We need to build on communication between each other on the field," Shehi said.

"I'd like to finish 4-1."

The junior attributes the sluggish first half of the team's season to environmental and substitution problems, but said that with the improvements that the team has made over the past year, the future looks bright for this club sport.

Lecture discusses media's images of disabled

By LYNNE HERMANSEN
Kansas State Collegian

Participating in the Los Angeles Marathon requires training, practice and the strong determination to see it through. Finishing a marathon is seen as a great accomplishment for many people.

Henry Holden finished the Los Angeles Marathon, proving that anybody can succeed at their dreams — even people with disabilities.

Holden presented "The Misconceptions Continue: How the Media Represents People with Disabilities," Tuesday night in Forum Hall.

Holden contracted polio at the age of 4, during the 1952 national polio epidemic. Using crutches hasn't prevented Holden from pursuing his acting career, and other life goals.

"It hasn't stopped me from the quality of life," Holden said. "I do more things then the vast majority of this audience."

Holden is a certified scuba diver and enjoys riding at the National Horse Show at Madison Square Garden.

Holden gave the audience his childhood background before proceeding with a slide show.

"I played with the neighborhood kids," Holden said. "They always included me."

Holden has been an advocate for 20 years concerning the lack of disabled people featured in television and advertising or their negative misrepresentation.

"The media can show views of people in wheelchairs as sickly," Holden said.

"But they are active members of society."

Holden said when disabled people are shown with politicians, the issue always concerns health care.

Holden said advertising's main objective is to sell sex.

"Disabled people normally have not been featured in advertising, because people view disabled people as sexless creatures," Holden said.

Holden said 60 percent of the population will become disabled either for the short or long term.

"Disabilities gives equal opportunities, it doesn't discriminate," Holden said.

Staci Reaser, junior in family life and community services, said Holden's lecture inspired her.

"Personally, it hits home with me, so I understand exactly where he's coming from," Reaser said.

Holden's lecture gave students an uplifting portrayal of people with disabilities.

"It was good to hear other people's aspects, and how the disabled are portrayed in the media," said Mike Smith, sophomore in management information systems.

"He brought up good points. It makes a person reevaluate how we treat people from different backgrounds."

Holden stressed that people with disabilities have choices.

"You can either succeed or fail in life, like everybody else," Holden said. "We can strive to be Miss America or beg."

Holden said many times disabled people do not know what they are capable of achieving.

"You try and you find out how far you can go," Holden said.

MASKING CULTURE

3-D Design class discovers identity through project

By ERIN SCHNEWEIS
Kansas State Collegian

Batman's covers everything but his mouth, the Phantom of the Opera's only covered half of his face and no one knows what Jason looks like because of his.

But masks aren't limited to characters in literature and movies.

They also have been a large part of traditions and customs in a variety of cultures, which is why students from Lynda Andrus' 3-D Design class spent hours working on their own masks.

"Most of the students put their hearts and souls into them," Andrus said.

The masks are on display for the next two weeks as part of the "Masks for Many Cultures" exhibit on the second-floor hallway of Willard Hall.

There are 70 masks representing a variety of cultures.

Andrus said the students have been working on their masks since the semester began.

She said she made her students conduct research on the culture they wanted to represent in their artwork before actually working on the masks themselves.

Jan Sabach, exchange graduate student in anthropology, said he spent about 60 hours working on his mask. He said he tried to represent his own heritage in his mask.

"Because I am European, I wanted to use some European influences," Sabach said.

Each mask is different from the others, Andrus said. Unusual shapes and materials, including radio parts, lights and metals, were used to make them.

Andrus said there is a variety in colors used for the masks as well.

Some students chose to use vivid colors, and others tried to go for more of an antique look.

She said art activities such as this one helps add culture to students' lives.

"Especially in Kansas, you don't get to see multi-cultural art work," she said.

Waylon Glick, junior in advertising, said he plans on seeing the mask exhibit because it is something unlike anything he's seen before.

"I've never had the opportunity to go to any art museums that have displayed this type of work," Glick said. "I think it will be interesting to see the different forms of art work."

Andrus said the artwork is of high quality even though the students who are exhibiting are in a lower-level art class.

"For a 200 level class, the quality of the craftsmanship is amazing. It's something that I think everyone will enjoy," she said.

A mask titled "The Morning After" by Lorria Graham was created with African, Mardi Gras and modern mask influences.

German opera change of pace, offers comical story line

By CRISTINA JANNEY
Kansas State Collegian

The plot of the operetta "Die Fledermaus" is a web of deceit and disguise spun in the name of love and comedy.

"Die Fledermaus," German for "the bat," will be performed at 7:30 p.m. Tuesday in McCain Auditorium. It will be performed by the touring company of San Francisco's Western Opera Theater.

The operetta will provide a special opportunity for first-time or novice opera-goers, said Thom Jackson, McCain marketing and development officer.

He said the operetta has been translated from its original German to English, and operettas typically are comic compared to the dramatic and tragic operas.

"It is a lot of fun," Jackson said. "It's not heavy and deep and serious."

As the story goes, the character of Eisenstein is supposed to be serving time in jail for assault, but he goes off to a party instead. His wife, Rosalinde, thinking she is safe, invites her lover to her home.

A prison official comes to the house looking for Eisenstein. At a loss of how to explain how a strange man was in her husband's dressing clothes, she tells the official her lover is her husband. The lover is carted off to jail.

Eisenstein meets his wife at a masquerade party later that night, but neither knows the identity of the other. The bat title in part comes from the costume of the prince at the masquerade.

The music tends to fit the tone of the operetta and be more lively than perhaps an opera score. Jackson said the music is exquisite, which also makes it a favorite of seasoned opera audiences.

The operetta was composed by Johann Strauss. One of the distinguished features of the music is Strauss' Viennese Waltz, said Reginald Pittman, who will give a lecture about the operetta and its composer prior to the performance.

Pittman, assistant professor of music, said this operetta stands out because it was composed at a time when serious opera was dominating stages.

The operetta was harshly received when it debuted in Vienna in 1873, perhaps because of a somber mood created by difficult economic times in that region, Pittman said. It closed after only 16 performances.

However, it was more well received in other European cities and still is performed in the United States and the rest of the world.

Both Pittman and Jackson said the opportunity to have the Western Opera Theater perform "Die Fledermaus" here is significant because it is one of the best companies in the world.

The price students and others will pay to see the performance is also significant, Jackson said.

"Students will be able to see some of the most expensive theater most inexpensively," Jackson said.

PERFORMANCE INFO

The pre-performance lecture will be given at 6:30 p.m. Tuesday in McCain 205 by Reginald Pittman, assistant professor of music. Tickets are $18 and $20 for students, $32 and $38 for seniors and $36 and $40 for the general public.

Jet crash kills 2, injures 1 near Wichita airport

By ROXANA HEGEMAN
The Associated Press

WICHITA — A business jet crashed into a field near Wichita's Mid-Continent Airport on Tuesday afternoon, killing two pilots and critically injuring a third.

The plane went down near the airport's southwest corner about 3 p.m. while taking off.

The Challenger series plane made by Bombardier Inc. went off the side of a runway at 2:49 p.m., said Felix Lococo, manager of the Federal Aviation Administration Flight Standards District office.

The plane crashed on Tyler Road, a street on the west edge of the airport.

Wichita Fire Chief Bob Thompson confirmed the two fatalities and said the survivor was taken to the burn center at Via Christi Regional Medical Center-St. Francis Campus. Thompson said all three men in the crash were Bombardier pilots.

The business jet hit an airport perimeter fence and started a grass fire along both sides of Tyler Road. The fires have been put out, officials said.

The jet lost its left engine on Tyler Road and landed just a few feet from the engine. The badly burned fuselage was mostly intact, but the tail of the plane was gone and debris was scattered across the road and into the ditches.

There was a small crosswind from the left, but that should not have been a problem for a professional pilot, Lococo said.

No details on the pilot were immediately available.

"All we know is that it was being operated by Bombardier," Lococo said.

Workers at the National Weather Service office near the airport heard the crash.

"There was the explosion. And then a couple of lights shook and it definitely felt like a sonic boom," said Chance Hayes, warning coordination meteorologist for the weather service. "It made the building shake and we definitely knew something had happened."

Birth control pills may increase risk of cancer

By LINDSEY TANNER
The Associated Press

CHICAGO — Birth control pills might raise the already heightened risk of breast cancer faced by women with a strong family history of the disease, a study suggests.

Among sisters and daughters of women with breast cancer, users of the pill were three times more likely than nonusers to get the disease.

If at least five family members had breast or ovarian cancer, pill users faced an 11-fold risk, the researchers reported in today's Journal of the American Medical Association.

Because granddaughters of women with breast cancer did not appear to be significantly more prone, the researchers suggested the risks were associated with older forms of the pill made before 1975. Older forms of the pill contained higher hormone levels.

But an accompanying editorial said it is unclear whether the risk is linked only to older pills. Instead, the granddaughters, whose average age was 43, might have been too young for breast cancer to have developed.

Birth control pills have long been thought to increase slightly women's risk of breast cancer, though recent research has suggested the risk disappears after women stop taking them. The data have been less clear on the pill's effect on women with a strong family history of the disease.

Thomas Sellers, a Mayo Clinic Cancer Center epidemiologist, said his study, which included 3,396 blood relatives of 426 women diagnosed with breast cancer between 1944 and 1952, is the first multigenerational study to address the question.

Relatives were questioned and medical records reviewed between 1991 and 1996.

The findings suggest the pill-linked risks are in women with the BRCA genetic mutations associated with breast and ovarian cancer, though genetic testing was not involved in the study. Sellers said he hopes the next phase of the research will answer that question as well as whether newer pills containing low doses of estrogen and progestin are safer.

The study raises troubling questions for women with the genetic mutations because birth control pills are one of the few proven methods of reducing the risk of ovarian cancer, Dr. Wylie Burke of the University of Washington wrote in the JAMA editorial.

The study "argues for avoidance of oral contraceptives, but at the price of forgoing an attractive option for reducing ovarian cancer risk," Burke said. Ovarian cancer is harder to detect and often more deadly than breast cancer.

What do Julia Louis-Dreyfus, Chris Farley, Bonnie Hunt, Tim Meadows, Bill Murray, Jeremy Piven and George Wendt have in common? They're all alumni of a club that opened its doors in 1959: Chicago's Second City. The club's specialty, improv comedy, was brand new, and success was instantaneous, earning The Second City Time Magazine kudos as "a temple of satire." Now, maybe you can't take off for a night in Chicago. That's all right. For 30 years The Second City has taken its show on the road and this year it's coming to Manhattan. So get ready for a medley of classic scenes, songs and improvisations that are always original, daring and hilarious. Presented in Nichols Theater. Performances are for mature audiences.

The army also said two Palestinians were seriously wounded when soldiers returned fire outside the Jewish settlement of Kfar Tapuah, near the West Bank town of Nablus.

Throughout the night and into the early hours Wednesday, dozens of incidents of shootings and stone-throwings occurred.

In Jerusalem, six Jewish youths were detained for throwing bottles at Arab homes. In the Israeli city of Acre, masked Arabs rioted and burned property owned by Jews, including a furniture store that burned to the ground.

Barak has given Arafat an ultimatum — extended Monday night by what he and aides said would be a few days — to halt the violence or face heavy reprisal. After his meeting with Annan in Jerusalem, the Israeli leader said it wasn't yet clear whether Palestinian rioters had been reined in.

"We are waiting and we are examining, not within a framework of 12 hours — that's not enough time to know what is happening," he said.

"We must not despair or lose hope, even in difficult times in which it seems to us that on the other side there is no partner for a true peace," he said earlier at a memorial for those killed in the 1973 Yom Kippur War. "Peace will come."

British Foreign Minister Robin Cook was to meet Barak on Wednesday, joining the cadre of international leaders trying to resolve the crisis that has brought the Israeli-Palestinian peace process to the brink of extinction.

Annan has taken on another difficult task as well: trying to broker the release of three Israeli soldiers captured on the Lebanon border by the Shiite Muslim guerrillas of Hezbollah. He goes to Lebanon on Wednesday.

Annan, who had met earlier in the day with Arafat in Gaza, said he was heartened by signs of a calming trend.

"Let's get to work — stop the violence, move back to the negotiating table," he said. "The region has suffered too much, there have been far too many killings and casualties ... We are at the crossroads — let's make the right turn."

The sides were discussing, through third parties, a Palestinian demand that Israel agree to allow an international commission to investigate the events. Nearly all the dead have been Palestinians, and the Palestinians say Israel has used excessive firepower.

Barak appeared more prepared than previously to compromise, telling Israeli radio he would accept an inquiry "under the authority and responsibility of the United States." Initially, he had said he would only consider submitting Israeli findings to the Americans for review.

It was clear, though, that Israel and the Palestinians were still at loggerheads over who was responsible for the violence.

"The clashes are still taking place in a very difficult situation, and Israel is using tanks and helicopters and missiles, and the (Jewish) settlers are continuing their crimes," Arafat said after a meeting with Ivanov.

Barak said Israel would act with "determination" to defend its soldiers and citizens. "We are not the source of the violence, and if the violence stops on the other side, there will be quiet," he said after his meeting with Annan.

Even as confrontations between the Israeli military and Palestinian rioters have tapered off, there has been a rise in vigilante-style attacks by Israeli and Arab civilians against each other.

On Tuesday, Palestinians threw stones at motorists on a Jerusalem thoroughfare, and several activists from the outlawed Jewish extremist Kach movement brawled with Arabs at a Jerusalem market, Israel radio said.

Procter said this debate will be similar to the vice presidential debate on Oct. 5. However, it will be different because Bush and Gore will be more familiar with each other.

"Since the first debate, both sides have seen where the other side is going to attack them," Procter said. "I think they will probably have some responses ready to go on those kinds of issues, and will be better prepared than they were for the first one."

Many viewers of the first debate didn't like the negativity displayed by the candidates, Procter said.

However, he said he expects a good turnout for the second debate due to the closeness of the presidential race.

"A lot of people were turned off by the first debate because it was sort of nasty and personal, and I heard a lot of people say 'I just didn't enjoy watching.'" Procter said. "So, I don't know if we'll lose people, but the race is still very close. So, I'd imagine people are still interested."

Jones said the negativity of the first debate didn't influence the civility of the DebateWatch discussion.

"I thought the atmosphere was extremely cordial," Jones said. "I felt that although there were partisan people there, there wasn't much animosity around."

ZOO

Working more closely with animals, getting acquainted better with aspects of the zoo and being better connected with special events are several advantages he named.

"A small zoo makes you a little more worldly as far as zoos go," Gulker said.

Davoren said during his experiences at the zoo, he has never been afraid of being attacked, and has never been attacked.

The dangerous animals never come into direct contact with the caretakers, he said.

Workers devise ways to feed and take care of them without having to be right there with them.

"You're more scared about leaving a door unlocked than the animals," he said. "That's what makes you go back and double check all the doors to make sure they're all double-locked and not open."

Davoren said he doesn't allow himself to get emotionally attached when working with the animals.

"You know there's shipping animals to other zoos, and animal deaths and animal births," he said.

"That's all part of the job. You get attached, but the animals are not your pets, so you don't get attached to them like that."

Dedication of monolith at MCC faces delays

By SARAH BAHARI
Kansas State Collegian

Completing and dedicating the 10 Commandments monolith is taking longer than expected, officials with Manhattan Christian College said.

The expected date of completion, Sunday, has been moved back because of various delays, most having to do with construction, said Jolene Rupe, public relations director for MCC.

The monolith will not be uncovered until the surrounding courtyard is completed, which probably will be sometime before the end of the year, Rupe said.

"We've had several goals as far as times, but we are making progress, and we're excited about that," she said. "We're sure we'll be happy with the finished product."

The monolith is on permanent loan to MCC from the Fraternal Order of Eagles. It was removed from the front of City Hall in spring 1999, after Manhattan City Commission, facing a civil suit, voted 3-2 to move the stone. According to the lawsuit, the monolith violated the constitutional clause separating church and state.

Now, a year and a half later, the monolith is near completion at 14th Street and Anderson Avenue.

Chuck Hall, volunteer coordinator for the construction, said there will be some small setbacks with a volunteer effort like this.

Some parts of the courtyard had to be hired out by professionals, he said, but much of the work has been done on a volunteer basis.

There still are several components to the courtyard awaiting completion, Rupe said. The sidewalk and landscaping are the two most significant parts not finished. Flagpoles and lighting must be installed. A cross will be erected in the center of the yard. Named bricks need to be completed, too.

Hall said he is anticipating the finished product.

"I think it's going to be even more exciting than it looks on paper," he said. "Once it takes a three-dimensional form, people will realize what's it all about."

The courtyard has become something Rupe said she dreamed of.

"We are thrilled the community has been so involved in this project," she said. "It has become a community courtyard. It's very rewarding to see this is happening."

You call this PEACE?

Tawfik Aboellail, president of the Muslim Student Association, pointed to a picture of a 4-year-old Palestinian boy slouched over in a pool of his own blood, as the result of an Israeli attack.

Below this picture, displayed Wednesday in the Union Plaza, silent protesters held a black and white sign that read, "Is this the peace you mean, Israel?"

"I don't understand what the Israelis want from these young children. This boy isn't even capable of throwing a rock back at them," said Aboellail, research assistant in diagnostic medicine pathobiology.

Members of the Muslim Student Association and the Islamic Center of Manhattan gathered to protest peacefully, holding signs, posters and pictures to raise awareness about the violence between Palestinians and Israelis throughout Israel and the West Bank.

"We want Americans to see the fair and balanced image of this problem and reflect on the issue," Aboellail said. "We want people to realize that Israel is using missiles and tanks to fight against Palestinians' stones."

Nearly two weeks ago, clashes between Palestinian youths and Israeli security forces began. Fights between Arabs and Jewish civilians broke out, drawing on deep feelings of hatred that have survived half a century of coexistence. Clashes have left 88 people dead since Sept. 28, most of them Palestinians.

"The Muslim community is outraged. We've been on occupied land in East Jerusalem since 1967, and they're trying to take it away from us," Aboellail said. "They've denied my every right, and now they want to take my home away. Where's the humanity?"

Aboellail said he's been upset by the way President Clinton has handled the situation.

"Clinton says he will help Israel no matter what, but America needs to step back and ask if Israel is the oppressed or the oppressor," he said.

Mollie Dvorak, senior in Spanish and philosophy, broke down in tears during the protest, after reading a

Halls drops to sponsor best scream competition

By NANCY FOSTER
Kansas State Collegian

Fans who know how to yell and scream at games will be able to use those skills Thursday night for the Screaming Fans Halls of Fame contest.

"We try to find the loudest, craziest fan for their team," said Regina Mahoney, accountant coordinator for BSMG Worldwide, a public relations firm.

The contest is at Rusty's Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon, and is free of charge. Registration is from 9 to 10 p.m., and the contest begins at 10 p.m.

"It's a neat event," Mike Arria, bartender at Rusty's, said. "And a big game's coming up, so there's a lot of enthusiasm and spirit running around."

Arria said he hopes to see a large turnout.

MORE INFO

The Screaming Fans Halls of Fame contest is at 10 p.m. at Rusty's Last Chance. Registration is from 9 to 10 p.m.
The winner will be flown to South Bend, Ind., to compete in mid December to compete against the winners from 15 other schools. The grand-prize winner will be given a trip for two to the National Championship game in Miami.

The search is a promotional tour for Halls sore-throat lozenges, and finding fans whose throats might hurt after games is just what they're after, Mahoney said. Participants take the Chance stage and yell, just as they would at a game.

"They just show off their enthusiasm and love for the game," Mahoney said.

There will be five judges, and Mahoney said they will include college sports anchors, radio disc jockeys and the Halls Decibel Dome Scream Team. Participants will be judged on enthusiasm, originality and volume. The volume will be measured by a custom decibel meter.

The winner from the Manhattan contest will be flown to South Bend, Ind., in mid December to compete against the winners from 15 other schools. The grand-prize winner will be given a trip for two to the National Championship game in Miami.

All finalists will be inducted into the Screaming Fans Halls of Fame displayed at the College Football Hall of Fame.

"We're going across the country to 16 college towns," Mahoney said.

She said Manhattan is the second stop on their list, as their first one was just last week in Miami. She said the turnout there was excellent.

"It's been amazing," she said. "It's been really big."

Arria said he is impressed by the fact that they are only going to 16 college towns, and that Manhattan is one of them.

Mahoney said there is no age requirement, and everyone is welcome to compete.

Gore makes apology for getting details wrong during the last debate.

"I can't promise I will never get another detail wrong, I can promise you I will do my best if I'm elected president, I will work by heart out to get it right for the American people," Gore said.

Kansas State Collegian

David McCandless came to DebateWatch Wednesday night with a statement to make.

Self-described as having always been quite liberal, and dressed in blue jeans and a "Vote Nader" T-shirt, McCandless said he came to DebateWatch to voice his dismay with the decision not to allow Green Party candidate Ralph Nader and Reform Party candidate Pat Buchanan to participate in the debates.

"I'm disappointed that not all of the candidates are included," said McCandless, freshman in political science and public relations. "I think it's a travesty that not all views are represented."

McCandless said that although he was disappointed that only George W. Bush and Al Gore were allowed into the debate, he valued the presidential debate series.

"I am really interested in a forum where candidates can discuss the issues," McCandless said. "I think it's important that the American people get a chance to see the issues and make a decision based on that."

McCandless was one of 67 viewers who attended the second DebateWatch. The event again took place in the UMB Theatre at the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art. This viewing featured a parliamentary style of audience response, with audience members shifting across the room to the side of the candidate they believed was winning.

David Procter, head of the Department of Speech Communication, Theatre and Dance, said the different format might have worked better if viewers had more room .

"I thought it worked well," Procter said. "There were more people than we thought would be here, which is good and bad. It's good because it's greater participation, but it's bad because it doesn't give us as much room to move around. But we still got a sense of how people felt as the debate went along."

Men's basketball tryouts scheduled for walk-ons

According to Jimmy Elgas, director of basketball operations, the men's basketball program will organize a one-day walk-on tryout at 7 p.m. Oct. 18 in Ahearn Field House.

Elgas said any students interested in trying out need to contact the men's basketball office by phone at 532-6531 or in person by Friday to fill out forms dealing with academic eligibility and medical information.

Thus far, Elgas said the tryouts have drawn interest from K-State students.

"We've gotten a really, really good response," he said, "and a lot of interest from the student body."

More than 550 listed to testify in Robinson trial

OLATHE, Kan. — There now are more than 550 people who could be called upon to testify in the case against suspected killer John E. Robinson Sr.

Eighty names were added to the list Tuesday by Johnson County prosecutors, who were required to notify Robinson's attorneys of all possible witnesses.

Still, only a small percentage are expected to be called to testify at Robinson's preliminary hearing, scheduled to begin Nov. 13.

Robinson is charged with two counts of capital murder in Kansas and three counts of first-degree murder in Missouri in the deaths of five women found in barrels in June. Two bodies were found on Robinson's property near La Cygne, Kan., and three more were found in barrels in a Raymore, Mo., storage locker.

The 56-year-old also is charged in Kansas with one count of first-degree murder in the death of Lisa Stasi, who disappeared in January 1985. Her body has not been recovered. Robinson also is charged with aggravated interference with parental custody for allegedly taking Stasi's 4-month-old daughter.

Parents seek reprimand due to principal's actions

ADRIAN, Mo. — A principal allegedly ordered fourth-grade children to strip to their underwear during a search for a missing war medal, and parents are seeking a reprimand.

The American Civil Liberties Union also sent a letter to school officials alleging that the pupils' civil rights had been violated.

The medal, later found on the classroom floor, was brought for show-and-tell at Adrian Elementary School on Oct. 3.

After it disappeared, principal Wallace Henrickson allegedly had the boys file into a restroom one at a time.

The boys were told to strip to their underwear in front of Henrickson and a male coach, and the girls were patted down by a female teacher.

After the medal was found, Henrickson apologized to students and brought them soft drinks, parents said.

Parents contacted the ACLU, which said the children were traumatized emotionally, physically and illegally, and cited court cases protecting children against unreasonable searches at school.

In addition to the reprimand, parents want an apology from school officials and a district policy on student searches, said Dick Kurtenbach, executive director of the ACLU of Kansas and Western Missouri.

School attorney Beverly Propst said the district was investigating and would take action if it was determined that an improper search occurred.

Judge debates ordering recall on Ford vehicles

OAKLAND, Calif. — For nearly two decades, the Ford Motor Co. allegedly ignored defects in ignition devices in millions of its vehicles, and kept consumers in the dark.

On Wednesday, a California judge is expected to decide whether to order a massive recall, something never before done by a judge.

In a tentative ruling in August, Superior Court Judge Michael E. Ballachey hinted he might order the recall, saying Ford repeatedly deceived federal regulators by claiming there were no problems with ignition devices in vehicles sold from 1983 to 1995.

Ford had been aware, since at least 1982, that installing the ignition module on the distributor exposed it to excessive heat, the judge wrote.

Ford documents show the automaker was warned by an engineer, that high temperatures would cause the device to fail and stall the engine, confirmed the problem in internal studies and could have moved the module to a cooler spot for an extra $4 a vehicle.

Ford has denied its ignitions were flawed.

Ballachey is presiding over a class action suit on behalf of 3.5 million current and former Ford owners in California. Similar suits are pending in Alabama, Maryland, Illinois, Tennessee and Washington.

While the judge wrote that Ford sold as many as 23 million flawed vehicles nationwide, a recall would apply only to about 2 million vehicles sold in California.

The Center for Auto Safety estimated that a California recall alone would cost Ford at least $125 million.

After complaints from customers and dealers about stalling, Ford recalled 1.1 million 1984-85 vehicles in 1987 to repair their ignition systems.

Festival educates campus on health

By DALAENA NEFF
Kansas State Collegian

Lafene Health Center launched its 10th annual Festival of Health in the Union Courtyard on Wednesday morning.

The festival was set up with a carnival-like atmosphere for students, said Mary Sue Moore, festival committee member and director of medical records at Lafene.

"The festival is used to make the student body aware of what Lafene offers, and to educate them on pertinent health issues," she said.

Lannie Zweimiller, director of Lafene, said 66 percent of the student body uses the health center throughout the year, but the festival is used primarily for education.

"It has increased awareness of Lafene, but utilization has stayed stable," he said.

Carol Kennedy, festival committee member and director of health education promotions, has helped with the festival for two years. She said it is a good way to promote Lafene.

"Around 350 to 500 people come through, and we provide information to anyone," she said. "There are students that can go to school here for three to four years and not know there is a health center."

The festival also gives the students an opportunity to meet part of the staff from Lafene.

"There is about a third of us here today, so it is good for students to meet some of the staff, so when they do go to the center they can see a familiar face," Kennedy said.

Even though Lafene is funded by student fees, the fees were not used to coordinate the health festival.

"We solicit and receive donations from approximately 100 local businesses in town, so we aren't spending students money to have the festival," Kennedy said. "We do get a good response from the local businesses and pharmaceuticals."

Lafene is a busy place, Kennedy said, and Lafene is there for the students who need to use its services, but the fair also promoted prevention.

"The STDs, HIV/AIDS Peer Education booth provided information for Hepatitis B vaccinations. That is a preventative measure," Kennedy said. "If everyone would get the vaccination, there wouldn't be a problem with that disease."

Kristi Lee, senior in dietetics, and Staci Matthews, junior in accounting and financial planning, said they use Lafene and the health festival to receive information to promote awareness through their sorority.

"Lafene provides a lot of information to share with the sorority. We like to put up info concerning wellness and women's health," Lee said.

Dr. Wendy Blank, an OB-GYN for Lafene's women's clinic, said having the festival is a great way to provide students with useful information.

"October is breast cancer awareness month, so the women's clinic booth has information about self breast examinations and general women's health," she said.

Blank also was around the festival to provide answers for general health questions. She said it was a great way to reach out to the students.

"I think it's great. It is a different way to interact with students and get information out to them," she said.

The newest part of Lafene is its Web site and the ability to refill prescriptions online, Mark Brown-Barnett, director of Lafene's pharmacy, said.

"Students can sign on 24 hours a day, to refill prescriptions, so Lafene doesn't have to be open. The information is received right in the pharmacy, so it stays confidential, and students can order over-the-counter medications, too," he said.

Barnett said the amount of students using this service has increased dramatically since last year.

"We get about 10 to 12 online prescription refills a day, which is up from a year ago from two to three," he said.

Students can put in their prescriptions at anytime and specify a time to pick them up. The Lafene pharmacy is open from 8:30 a.m. to 7 p.m. Monday through Friday and from 10 a.m. to 2 p.m. Saturday.

Melissa Timm, junior in kinesiology and pre-physical therapy, said she has used Lafene since she has been here.

"It's a really good access for the student, because a lot of us are financially tight. Everyone is also very friendly there. They really care and reach out to help," she said.

K-State engineering students elected to national council, excel in activities

■ History made as pair takes office at national level in organization.

By ERIN DEHN
Kansas State Collegian

Cory Lafferty and Joseph Thomas have something in common.

Both students recently were elected into offices in the National Association of Engineering Student Councils — the first time K-State has had offices at the national level.

Lafferty, senior in computer engineering, was elected chairman of the organization, and Thomas, sophomore in architectural engineering, was elected director of finance.

"It's a big honor," Thomas said. "I think it's a definite advantage for both of us to be at the same school."

Elections were Sept. 30 in Seattle, Wash.

"I was extremely excited," Lafferty said. "I couldn't wait to get home and tell my parents. It was an incredible feeling to know that K-State has never held a position on NAESC, and we now have the top two spots."

Richard Gallagher, associate dean and professor of engineering and Engineering Student Council adviser, said Lafferty and Thomas are maturing not only in academics, but as leaders.

"This demonstrates these are two of our students that obviously have positioned themselves to be leaders in college and excel in extracurricular activities," Gallagher said.

Aside from their new positions, both students are officers in ESC. Lafferty is serving his second term as president, and Thomas is the freshman leadership committee advisor.

"I don't want to look back on college and see the missed opportunities, but instead see the chances I took and the challenges I met," Lafferty said.

As resident assistant for second floor Putnam Hall, Thomas advises incoming students to become involved outside of class.

"The classroom cannot really prepare you for what the real world is going to be like," he said. "You also have to have communicative skills."

Protests serve to spur campus' news awareness

In Kansas, awareness of international events is, unfortunately, usually not that common. This is true with our university.

That is even more reason why the Muslim Student Association should be applauded.

The organization gathered Wednesday to peacefully protest, through signs, posters and photographs, the violence between Palestinians and Israelis that is occurring throughout the West Bank and Israel. Their protest was to bring forth much-needed awareness. The bottom line is that there are a lot of students and faculty who are affected by this tragedy.

Other student groups and organizations should become more involved with events, both positive and negative, that shape not only our campus or town, or even the United States. There needs to be more education in terms of what happens outside of our country, as well.

Those who are trying to learn more about foreign affairs are only bringing more insight and understanding that will not only benefit themselves, but everyone who surrounds them.

It is important to remember how diverse our college really is. The peaceful protest is one of many steps in the right direction that need to continue.

We need to become more interested in things that don't directly seem to affect us, because indirectly, they do.

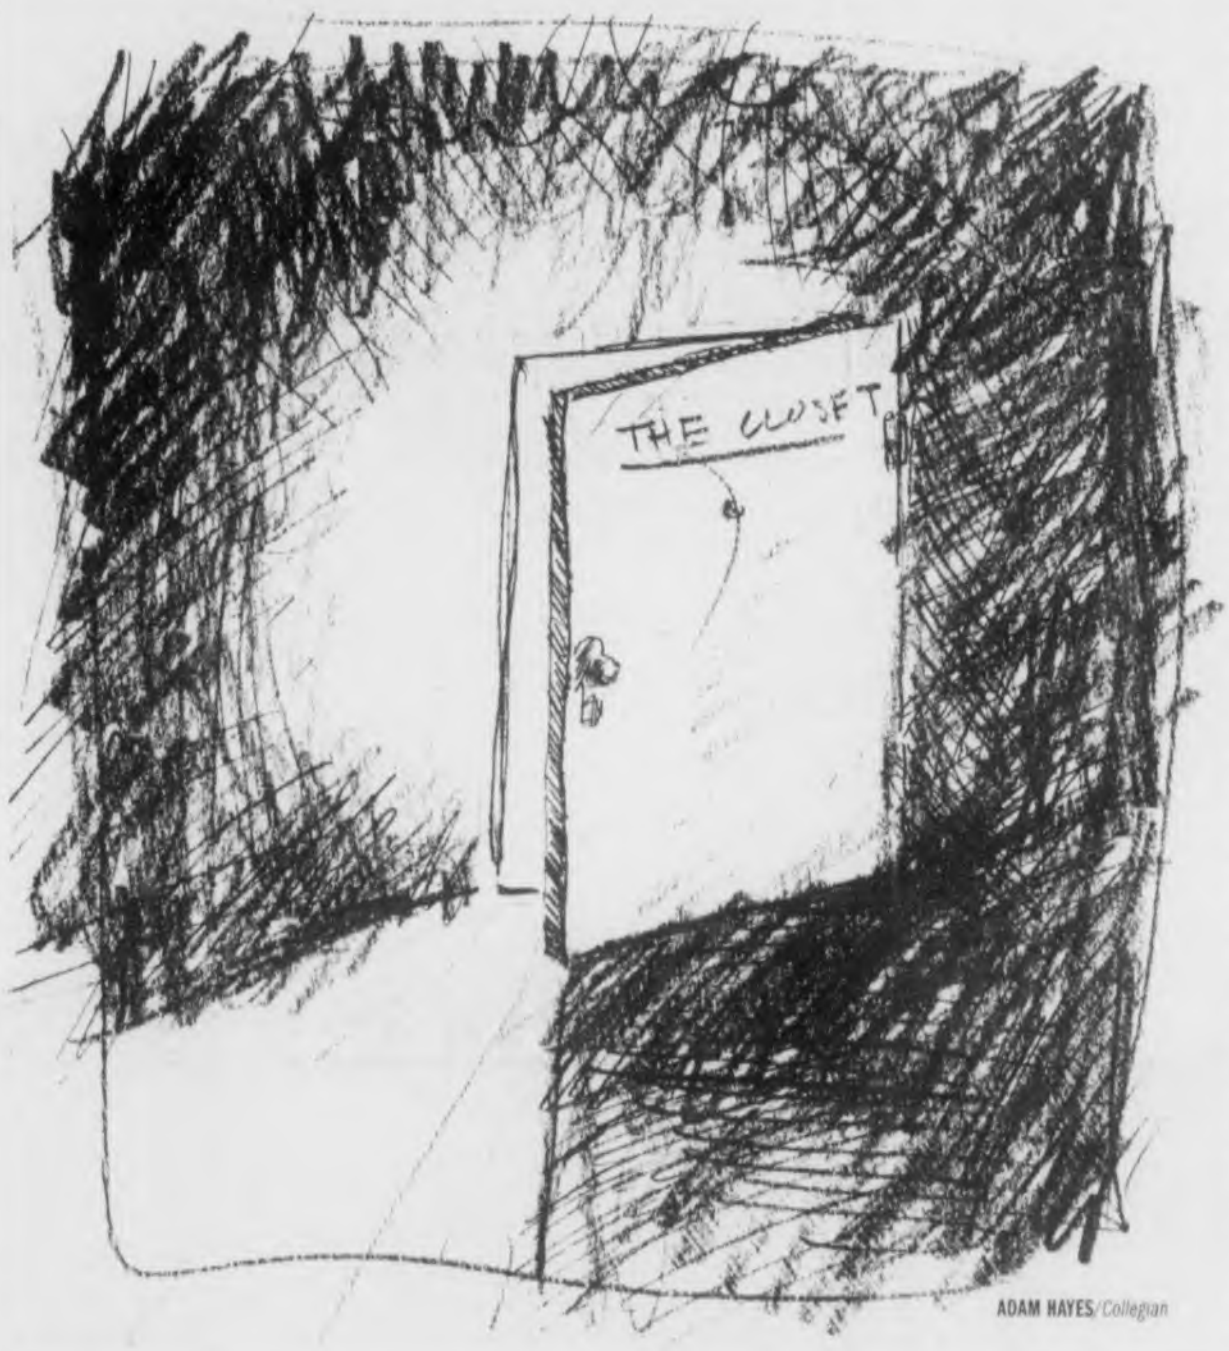
Come out as yourself

Week celebrates all facets of one's personality, not just sexuality

SARAH BAILEY

I think I shall call this column, "Coming Out Week and What It Means To Me," by Sarah Bailey, age 22, 5'6", 16th grade. Great title, huh?

I should mention at this point that any time I refer to "coming out" in this column, I don't mean "coming out" as an Al Gore supporter in the middle of Kansas, or "coming out" as a fan of Crystal Pepsi (does anyone even remember that stuff?).



By "coming out," I mean coming out as a homosexual, bisexual or transgendered person. I thought that might reduce the number of people calling the Campus Fourum with statements like, "Yeah, I came out as a KU football fan last week, and I didn't find it as freeing as I thought I would."

So now that that's all cleared up, we can get on with my lovely column.

In my spare time at this university — "spare time" being a rather questionable term — I am president of the Queer Straight Alliance. QSA offers two main things to this university. First, we offer a support network to gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgendered (glbt) persons and their allies. Secondly, and what can be seen this week, QSA helps educate the campus on topics related to glbt issues. I hope many of you took advantage of this free type of education this week.

I would imagine many of the people on campus wonder what any of this really has to do with them. Well, to be honest, Coming Out Week probably means little to most of you directly. I would hope it means a lot to you indirectly, however.

Coming out is a statement of oneself. When I come out to my friends and those around me, as a proud homosexual woman, I actually am saying to them, "I am me. Please look at me as I am and as a whole person. Do not assume who I am, but rather let me know you understand me."

ADAM HAYES/Collegian

Now, when I told my parents just three weeks ago, "I'm gay," I don't think they necessarily got all of that out of that statement. But, ultimately, that is what I meant, and that is why I wanted to tell them about this aspect of my life.

Perhaps a little anecdote would be appropriate to help explain. This past Sunday, QSA sponsored a panel in one of the residence halls. For this type of event, we usually get three members of QSA to answer questions, any and all questions, the audience might have. We were having a bit of a difficult time getting people to come to the panel, but finally we gathered a small group and did our panel. The panelists answered questions about coming out to our parents, the climate in Manhattan and children (There also was one woman who wanted to know if I was the crazy woman who attends the women's basketball games wearing an orange hat and carrying a dry erase board. While this had nothing to do with glbt issues, it does provide me with a moment to mention that the first game is Nov. 7).

The most important aspect of this story didn't happen during the panel, however. After the panel, one of the women who had been in the audience stopped me and said, "I was really impressed with the panel." I thought she had been impressed with my amazing ability to babble and speak gibberish during the panel, but she explained further by saying, "You guys really changed my mind. I used to think that being gay was 'bad.' This was the first time that I took the chance to see things from the other side."

And that is exactly the reason QSA does panels and participates in things like Coming Out Week. It gives people the chance "to see things from the other side." This was the first time the woman from the panel had allowed herself to empathize with people she had categorized as "bad." She could respect that we were people dealing with some of the same types of things that anyone else would deal with. She didn't have to agree with a word we said, but she found she could respect us nonetheless.

Coming Out Week is not necessarily a celebration of "being gay is OK." It is a celebration of "being yourself is OK." I think everyone can, and should, rejoice with them. I ask that you respect that and join in our celebration. And for that reason, I wish each and every one of you a happy Coming Out Week.

Sarah is a senior in speech and president of the Queer Straight Alliance. You can e-mail her at sdb2452@ksu.edu.

90-day training policy unfair to employees

MIAH WHITAKER

Someone I know recently lost her job. There was no warning and no documented reprimand; there wasn't even a stated reason. She was just let go without even being informed why.

How can this happen? She'd been employed for less than 90 days and therefore still was considered a trainee.

Many businesses have the training policy, which is perfectly legal. The policy says, among other things, that an employee can be terminated for any reason, including none, within the 90-day training period. The employer does not need to state the reason, if any exists.

That bothers me. As the unofficial assistant to my last supervisor, I became quite familiar with a termination policy that required documented discussions, written warnings and an actual reason for termination. These things could be overlooked in cases of physical violence or theft, of course. The thing that stuck me the most was that this policy applied to everyone, including the summer employees, who would only be employed for a few months.

I recently started a new job and am working under the 90-day policy. I actually dread going to work and finding out who has been let go since I clocked out last.

It bothers me that I could lose my job, not because I have a poor job performance, but because my boss doesn't think I'm friendly enough when she stops to ask how I'm doing.

I've had a lot of time to think about the 90-day policy since I've started my new job. It occurs to me this policy could be abused in the hands of a less-than-scrupulous employer.

Many people seeking jobs are looking for permanent work and do not want to apply for seasonal jobs. What keeps someone from hiring an employee to help with a busy period and then terminating employment a month down the line?

Workplace discrimination is another touchy subject. This is one of the reasons my last employer was so careful with the documentation process. We made sure there was never any doubt as to why an employee was being reprimanded or terminated. Without a clearly stated reason for termination, it's easy to conclude that someone is being fired for an inappropriate reason.

As a trainee, no one is obligated to inform me of why I'm being fired. If I have had no complaints about my work, and no one has complained to me about who I interact with, the customers or my co-workers, what am I to think about why I'm getting canned?

The training period helps protect an employer from getting saddled with an unsuitable permanent employee. But what protects the employees? What keeps us, the little people, from getting used?

I'm not saying every person who loses their job during the first 90 days should not have. Some people just are not suited for some jobs, but firing them without any warning or without telling them why isn't fair.

There should always be a reason, and it should have something to do with job performance.

Miah is a junior in English and social sciences/media. You can e-mail her at snowite@ksu.edu.

Bush's comments on military not as ignorant as stated

Editor,

I would like to address the column, "The Battle to be Commander and Chief," by Terry Welch. In his column, he stated that George W. Bush showed little understanding of the problems that face the military or understanding of what the military even does. He referenced the statement of the role of the military, "is to fight and win war, and therefore prevent war from every happening in the first place." This is not something that Bush made up, this is from the Army's mission statement, which is put out by the Department of the Army. Let us focus our attention to the readiness, morale and missions.

First, the readiness issue. Here again, Bush's statement on the readiness of our 10-division Army was taken from a Pentagon report stating the condition of the Army's state of readiness. Eight divisions were considered combat ready, two were not. This was due to a combination of factors: lack of unit training, equipment shortages and personnel shortages. Having spent 20 years in the Army serving in various divisions from Germany, Korea and the Persian Gulf War, I have been assigned to two division staffs, as well as serving in combat line units. I feel that I also have some experience in military affairs. I can attest to the fact that one fifth of our equipment is broken down at any given time. Only the rapid deployment divisions receive sufficient funding.

Morale is at an all-time low. It is not just the enlisted soldiers leaving the military, mid-level officers and senior noncommissioned officers are also leaving in record numbers, creating shortages of experienced leaders. Here again there are numerous reasons, ranging from too many developments, poor pay and a lack of training time due to financial restraints. In line companies, more time is spent on post maintenance details than on actual field training.

The quality of current enlisted soldiers under the Clinton/Gore administration has waned. As an U.S. Army recruiter in Virginia under Bush Sr., the only applicants at that time, who could be enlisted, were considered college level applicants. Today, the military is taking non-high school graduates. That is not to say these are bad people, but you can see the disparity.

As for the claim of Al Gore's $100 billion increase in military budget spending, let us not forget that the budget short falls over the past eight years have been under the Clinton/Gore administration. As he makes numerous claims from inventing the Internet to his comment about going to Texas with the head of FEMA, I am not sure that I believe the $100 billion increase, either.

In conclusion, as far as Bush's statements concerning the military, he seems to be right on target. He also has demonstrated that he has the backing of Gen. Colin Powell; Dick Cheney, former secretary of defense; and Gen. Norman Schwartzkopf. I am sure these people have given him some pretty good advice.

Gore, Bush engage in 2nd debate

■ Presidential candidates both agree Arafat should restrain violence in Israel.

The Associated Press

WINSTON-SALEM, N.C. — Al Gore criticized Gov. George W. Bush's record in Texas in debate Wednesday night, saying he blocked hate crimes legislation and presides over a state that ranks last in health insurance for families. "We care about our people in Texas," Bush shot back, and said the state spends $4.7 billion a year on the uninsured alone.

In the waning moments of their second 90-minute clash, Bush said Gore had misrepresented several facts in their first debate, and that prompted an unusual apology from the vice president.

"I got some of the details wrong," the vice president responded softly. "I'm sorry about that, and I'm going to try to do better" in the future.

The two men met on a stage at Wait Chapel at Wake Forest University with less than four weeks remaining in their close, volatile race for the White House. The atmosphere seemed more congenial than when they debated last week in Boston, and when it ended, Bush mouthed the words "good job" to his rival as they shook hands.

The calendar calls for one more pre-election debate, next Tuesday in St. Louis.

It was a debate in two parts: the first half a polite conversation about foreign policy, the second half a more pointed series of disagreements over domestic issues.

Gore and Bush both called on Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat to restrain the violence rocking Israel. The vice president also called on Syria to "release three Israeli soldiers that have been captured" by Hezbollah militia forces during more than 10 days of violence. Both men stressed support for Israel.

Asked by moderator Jim Lehrer of PBS about the Middle East, Gore said, "We need to insist that Arafat send out instructions to halt some of the provocative acts of violence that have been going on."

Bush, given a chance to answer the same question, began by saying that in times of tension overseas, "We ought to be speaking with one voice. I appreciate the way the administration has been working to calm the tensions."

He also said the United States ought to call on Arafat "to have his people pulled back."

Gore defended the administration's handling of Iraq's Saddam. Bush, whose father was president during the Persian Gulf War, declared that the "coalition against Saddam is unraveling ... sanctions are being violated." If Saddam is developing weapons of mass destruction, he said, "There are going to be consequences if I'm president."

Gore, who has been buffeted by allegations that he embellishes the facts, readily offered a mea culpa after Lehrer raised the issue in a question to Bush, and the governor read from a 1988 staff memo to then-Sen. Gore to be careful about getting facts right.

"I can't promise I will never get another detail wrong. I can promise you I will do my best if I'm elected president, I will work my heart out to get it right for the American people," Gore said.

The different format of the actual debate, with Bush and Gore seated at a table, was declared a success by a show of hands at DebateWatch.

Kent Holle, senior in secondary education, said the seated format allowed for more of a face-off atmosphere.

"I liked it," Holle said. "I liked the banter — to see how they reacted to each other besides the sniffs."

The two issues students said they felt were not addressed enough were economics and education.

Luther Willis, junior in secondary education, said he thought the candidates were missing the point on strengthening education in the United States.

"They want to get name brand education but they want to pay generic brand prices for it," Willis said.

Willis said neither of the debates had swayed his vote because the candidates would not comment on the need of higher teacher salaries.

Jay Stenfors, senior in secondary education, said he originally supported neither of the candidates, but the debates had pushed his vote to Bush's side.

"I started out with no real opinion," Stenfors said. "But I like the way Bush fights for what he thinks. He's really passionate about what he thinks."

PROTEST

story about Muslims who were showered with live ammunition while worshiping at a site on land Israelis claim as their own.

"I just stood over there and cried. I always knew they had problems, and now I realize there's so much killing," Dvorak said. "We just take so much for granted here. I can't even imagine living in fear of being shot. There are so many things going on in the world that I think we're scared to deal with."

Muslim Student Association member Duaa Mohammad, junior in chemistry, said Americans need to know the truth about the situation, instead of believing everything that's presented by the media.

"On TV they blame Palestinians for the violence. But there's 10 times more killings on our side," Mohammad said.

Ahlam Al-Rawi, doctoral student in physics and member of the Muslim community, said she became more involved in the issue after seeing the violence against women and children on the news.

"All humans should condemn actions against human beings," Al-Rawi said.

She said she hoped students would come to the protest with an open mind and have things explained clearly to them.

"Members of the Islamic community are not terrorists. We're just against the killing of innocent people, injustice and violence," she said. "We want people to stop here, and stop and look and think about the underlying problem of inhumane treatment."

Optimism that a war-averting deal could be struck was expressed by U.N. secretary general Kofi Annan on Tuesday, but Al-Rawi said she doubts things will be settled.

"Israelis will agree to less than the U.N. asks," she said. "After all these years of fighting, there will never be peace."

Volleyball team comes back in record-breaking night

K-State's volleyball team (12-4, 6-2 Big 12) didn't play well against Colorado (7-8, 3-5 Big 12), but when the chips were down, Liz Wegner cashed in and led the Cats to a 3-0 (15-8, 15-12, 15-9) victory.

Wegner broke her school record for kills in a three-game match with 34 in 59 attacks. Head coach Jim McLaughlin said Wegner's play propelled the Cats past Colorado.

"Wow, 59 swings, 34 kills, 42-percent hitting, those are big-time numbers," McLaughlin said. "She carried us at critical times. She finished plays. We have her in a position to finish, and we need to keep going to her.

"The only things she needs to improve on are the little things. She's capable of all the mighty big things, but it's the little things over a period of time I would like to see her do. She's capable of anything. When she gets her whole game going and it's all complete, watch her, it's going to be a big-time thing."

Wegner was happy with the win and breaking the record, but said she still wasn't happy with the way she played.

"I thought I played OK," Wegner said. "I made too many hitting errors in my opinion. If I would have put some of my attacks away early, then maybe we wouldn't of had to come back like we did. But, our team did a real good job of digging the ball and they deserve all the credit in the world for that."

The Cats started the match off impressively,

Men's golf team places 12th at meet

That's a wrap.

Seemingly as soon as it began, the K-State men's golf team finished its fall season with a 12th-place finish at the Missouri Bluffs Invitational in St. Charles, Mo.

In the tournament, K-State faced a variety of Big 12 schools and followed the Cats previous formula of play so far this fall — start slow and finish strong.

"We had another slow start, and were in last place after the first round Monday," head coach Tim Norris said. "Then we had a great comeback in the second."

That second round was highlighted by the play of Scott McNeely, who led the charge with a 67.

Norris said he was pleased with the round, and that it is indicative of the way McNeely, who finished the tournament in 12th place, is capable of playing.

"Scott's a guy that when he gets started, he's just as comparable in his ability to Bryan Milberger," Norris said. "If both of those guys get going and start competing with each other in every tournament, then we will be successful."

K-State's men golfers will begin the spring 2001 season at the Feb. 12-13 Rice University Classic in Houston.

With McNeely's strong second round, the Cats ended the day in 10th place but fell two spots on day two to finish 12th in the 15-team tournament.

Norris said he is not necessarily pleased with where the team ended up in the standings, but it does show K-State has made progress since last fall, when it finished last in the field.

"Well, yeah, there was big improvement between this tournament and last year's tournament," Norris said.

Norris said the team's fall calendar, which schedules five consecutive tournaments, is set up to be rigorous during season play, in order to give the players some time off.

"We encourage them to take a break, when they are done in the fall. That is kind of why the schedule is the way it is, so we can kind of get it over with," Norris said. "The players have been playing, most of them since last February, and they are due for a break, not physically, but mentally."

The Cats now will take some time off, but Norris said next season looks promising.

"We have a couple freshman who look like they're going to be in the lineup the rest of the year," Norris said of newcomers A.J. Elgert and Aaron Watkins. "If we can get three players playing well at the same time, then we will be in really good shape."

Oklahoma game does not warrant media's attention, reminders of importance

MIKE VIETTI

Overreacting — easily one of the most frustrating little nuances about being a evolutionized monkey.

We all do it. We all regret it. Sometimes it takes a while, sometimes it takes only a fraction of a second, but overreacting is one of those constants — it's always been, and forever will be, a bad thing.

So, forgive some of my counterparts for boldly proclaiming K-State's upcoming game against Oklahoma as one of the most important in K-State history or for announcing that the Sooners are now a chief rival — they might not regret it yet, but they will after Saturday.

For the first time in my adult, err ... semi-adult life, I'm going to approach this game against the Sooners the way that K-State and Bill Snyder will: it's the most important game of the year because it's the next game.

No more, no less.

Remember three of four years ago when Nebraskans and Husker players frustrated us Wildcats by saying K-State wasn't but a speck on their map to a national title?

I can, and I really can't remember a time when I was so mad. Year after year, K-State would enter the game against Nebraska with a solid record, but the Huskers never would buy into our notion that K-State was a top-10 team. They told us — to our face no less — that K-State wasn't any more important to them than Missouri or Baylor or anybody.

It's time for K-State fans to adopt that attitude because the players and coaches already have. It's time for us to take the step up — not necessarily cockiness, just a quiet bravado that says, "K-State is one of the best teams in the country, and we know it."

I really don't think we have that yet. If we did, the Oklahoma game wouldn't be as big as it is. Maybe the media's got us thinking this way. Who knows? I do know one thing for sure, screw the national media. If they don't respect us now, they never will. They're mad because they can't change the fact that if K-State wins every single one of its games in any given year, the Wildcats will play for the national championship.

But getting back to Oklahoma, their fans and this team remind me of K-State four or five years ago. They think they deserve to be K-State's rival, much in the same way as we thought we should be Nebraska's.

Them Oklahomans hate K-State — ask any of the players from Oklahoma. Why? Who knows, but the hatred is there. Not that they don't already, but I'm thinking much of that should be shifted over to John Blake or Howard Schnellenberger — they're they ones who never led the Sooners to a winning record from 1994 to '98, not K-State.

So Oklahoma had one 7-5 season last year and they think they're ready to tinker with the big boys — where's Lee Corso when you need him? Not so fast, my friends.

This is the confidence I'm talking about. Everybody in the world is saying this is the college football game of the week: ESPN, ABC, your dog, my cat — but it doesn't mean anything more than another digit in the win column for the Wildcats.

Is Oklahoma good? Sure. Was their win against Texas impressive? Sure. Does the coaching staff there add a little something to this game? Sure, but just a pinch.

This is just one more game on the slate. We don't need the media telling us it's crucial to K-State's success. We don't need the hype OU fans are trying to give this matchup. We all know how good K-State is. We know they'll take care of business this Saturday and every Saturday afterwards.

That's the way they think up there in Lincoln, and it's about time we started thinking that way, too.

Tall Order

Coffee shops cater to distinctive tastes, provide environment for variety of people

By JJ DUNCAN
Kansas State Collegian

Regulars fill the seats, mixed drinks and house specialties are available at the counter, and even though the shots are strong, there isn't any alcohol available in a coffee shop.

Jamie Leonard, manager of Espresso Royale Caffe, who can reel off everything from the bean to the syrup used in the coffee drinks, said there isn't much difference from working at a coffee shop and working as a bartender.

"Would I liken myself to a bartender? Yes," she said. "You have regular customers where you know what they want, and if you work here long enough, you learn about their personal life as well. You learn a lot about people. It's very much like being a bartender."

Just as a bartender learns how to make drinks and how everything is supposed to taste, so does the barista with coffee. A barista, the traditional Italian name for a coffee drink maker, requires a training process to teach the way that each drink is made and how it should taste, said Kacia Beugelsdijk, barista at Java Espresso & Bakery.

"I've worked here a year now, and every now and then there are times when I'll make a bad espresso shot or get the foam wrong," Beugelsdijk, sophomore in apparel design, said. "I've gotten so much better than when I first worked here, but it's a continuing learning process."

Employees at Espresso Royale go through a training process before they are allowed to serve drinks to customers, Leonard said. The employee must know the differences between drinks and learn the tastes of all of them, so they can distinguish between them and are able to tell whether it is good or bad.

Servers must also know how to get orders right for those who have a certain drink they want. Leonard said some people order things that aren't necessarily on the menu, and they have specific tastes, and the server should be able to get that drink right.

"There is one woman who always orders one shot of espresso in a medium cup with no foam and thick milk, but she wants you to put a packet of Equal in before you mix the milk with the shot," she said. "If she sees someone she doesn't recognize at the counter she just says, 'Jamie knows what it is,' if I'm standing there."

Specific drinks are important, because there are people who don't like coffee but still go into coffee shops because there are other drinks they like. Adrienne Dreher, junior in family studies, said she doesn't drink caffeine often, but when she does, there are only certain things she likes.

"I like the hazelnut flavor," she said. "I usually order a vanilla French roast coffee with hazelnut flavor, because I like the stronger French flavor."

Learning the drinks of the regulars satisfies them and can make them faithful customers.

Beugelsdijk said it is challenging to try and learn each person's drink, but it is convenient for practical purposes.

"If I have a whole lot of customers in line and I see a regular, I'll just ask if they want the usual," she said. "It's fun for me to see if I can remember the drink, but it also makes the customer feel welcome and important."

Creating a welcoming environment is important for a coffee shop, Leonard said. That is because a coffee shop is traditionally a place where people go to study or converse in a laid-back atmosphere. Leonard said she consciously tries to give the shop an attitude and a feel that is conducive to those things.

For Espresso Royale, Leonard said she tries to make the shop arty and intellectual, while at the same time keeping it all-inclusive. The trick is to make as many people as possible comfortable in the shop.

"Coffee houses have this stereotype of being undergroundish and alternative, almost like a bar without alcohol with an intellectual feel to it," she said. "You have to be careful to maintain that in the evening, but we also have families who come in here during some parts of the day. You have to make sure the environment is pleasant for any of those people."

The environment is exactly what attracted Beugelsdijk to working in a coffee shop, she said. After hanging out in coffee shops all through high school, it seemed like an interesting place to work.

Leonard said even though the job is interesting and can be fun, it is important to realize how much work it can be.

"It's a great place to work, and you meet so many smart and interesting people," she said. "But we also have to wipe down tables, sweep, mop, clean everything and do stocking. It's not just about making drinks."

Defining the cup

Coffee – a medium ground bean that creates a drink that prevents bitterness.

Espresso – a finely ground coffee which creates a very strong, bitter taste. It can be consumed in straight shots, but usually is used in making other drinks, including cappuccinos and lattés.

Cappuccino – at least one shot of espresso with steamed milk added in a way that creates a foam on top.

Latté – at least one shot of espresso with steamed milk added in a way that doesn't create foam, which gives it a lighter taste than the cappuccino.

Mocha – a latté with chocolate added.

Bill to raise student fees will be voted on

By BRYAN SCRIBNER
Kansas State Collegian

A bill that could raise student privilege fees $6.50 per semester will be introduced at tonight's Student Senate meeting.

Privilege Fee Chair Ryan Walker said the bill would decide whether a proposed student activities center should be voted on by students. The center would cost $4.8 million.

Final action on the bill will take place Oct. 19, and a studentwide vote is tentatively scheduled for Nov. 9, Walker said. He said 60 percent of those voting must be in favor of the project for it to pass.

Dustin Leonard, fifth-year senior in business, said students who approve the idea will not be concerned with the cost.

"For the price you pay, there's a big opportunity for student development," he said.

Construction of the center would begin next fall if it is accepted. It would take about two years to complete the project.

The building would be an addition to the K-State Student Union's east side. It would be a three-floor structure and would feature 120 cubicle spaces for student organizations. Greek Affairs, Union Program Council, Student Governing Association, multicultural student organizations and about four other organizations will receive offices.

Amish family of 5 buried on Wednesday

By ROXANA HEGEMAN
The Associated Press

HILLSBORO, Kan. — More than a thousand mourners came Wednesday to bury an Amish mother and her five children killed in a deadly weekend fire.

Their four silver coffins were as stark and unadorned as the traditional, dark Amish garb worn by family and friends who filled the sanctuary. The bodies of the three youngest children were put together in one coffin.

Mary Thayer and five of her daughters, Justina, 15; Theresa, 13; Jessamy, 8; Dorothea 6; and Bernadine, 3, died Saturday when their farmhouse went up in flames. Six other family members suffered only slight injuries when they jumped from the second floor to escape the fire.

The survivors were the father, Richard, 51; Magdalena, 23; Matthias, 21; Andreas, 19; Alexander, 17; and Paula, 11.

Mourners learned during the services at Hillsboro Mennonite Brethren Church that Richard Thayer had spent the previous week in Parsons, helping tornado victims rebuild, but he missed his family and decided to return home Friday to see them. Some said later they found comfort in knowing that, and felt God's hand in giving him that last night with his family.

"We here don't see life more clearly than when we are staring death in the face," Ernest Strubhar told the crowd at the church.

He said family members would not want him to spend much time talking about them, but would want to glorify Jesus. "They would say, don't be sad for us," he said. "Believe in Jesus. Follow Jesus."

Much of the service was filled with Scripture readings and hymns.

"God speaks to us in these kind of occasions," Strubhar said. "This tragedy ... is like the voice of God — it's like a thunderstorm to get our attention."

The funeral procession stretched for about a mile as it slowly wound its way out of the rural town of Hillsboro to a remote country cemetery 20 miles away. A stiff wind blew across the hundreds huddled together to comfort the survivors and mourn the dead.

Among them were Ivan and Katie Kuepfer of Lobelville, Tenn. She counted Amish groups from at least 13 different states attending the service. The Kuepfers drove in Sunday when they heard to news.

"They just had a way about them," Ivan Kuepfer said as he tried to explain the many mourners from so many states. "A person couldn't be their enemy. They had friends from all walks of life."

jumping out to a 14-4 lead in the first game, as senior Kelle Branting picked up her 1,000th career kill, making her only the 11th player in K-State history to accomplish that feat. The Cats would have trouble putting the Buffaloes away, but would hold on to win the game, 15-8.

Wegner's clutch play was definitely needed in games two and three. The Cats dug themselves deep holes in both games, trailing 3-11 in game two and 1-7 in game three.

"We didn't play in the rhythm we're normally playing in," McLaughlin said. "But we found a way to win, which I think is the sign of a good team. We didn't play well, but we played well when we had to again. But against a good team, I don't know if we can always rely on coming back."

Junior setter Disney Bronnenberg said Wegner's play and the crowd were both huge factors in the Cats ability to turn the games around.

"The fans helped so much," Bronnenberg said. "They really helped rally us, they get us excited, especially when we're in the side-out wars back and forth."

The Cats have had trouble putting teams away all season, and McLaughlin said his team needs to sustain its energy the entire match in order to gain a killer instinct.

"I've yelled more from the bench and been up more this year, and I'd like to see them carry that emotional load," he said. "On great teams, two players carry that emotional load and this year it's only Kelle. I'd like to see Lisa Mimick do it, I'd like to see Liz do it. They don't have to be real loud, but they have to carry that load, and that's real important, because you need energy and your energy comes from your emotions. Right now, we're just peaks and valleys emotionally, and I'd like to see us sustain that fire — it's a K-State pride thing.

"We are getting better. When the chips are down we turn that switch on and we roll, but we need to keep it going from start to finish — that shows character."

Branting said she feels a since of urgency playing in her last year as a Wildcat.

"I'm trying to do everything that I can to keep the fire going," she said. "That's my job as a senior, but some of the others are starting to pick up the load, like Disney and Liz, so that's helped quite a bit."

UNION RENOVATIONS

Food court sees improvements

By JESSICA PITTS
Kansas State Collegian

After close to six months of construction during the K-State Student Union's renovation project, the Union Food Court opened its doors with a new look in February.

The food court, on the first floor of the Union, offers a variety of food selections in a one-stop location.

"It has really became everything we hoped it would be," said Bernard Pitts, executive director for the Union. "We have a wide variety of food items from national vendors all in one location and the central beverage and cashier's station make for a speedier process."

Nathan Geiger, sophomore in animal science, said he agrees that the food court has improved because of the renovations.

"I eat here occasionally because it is convenient," Geiger said. "It is better now because it offers more popular choices and it seems to be a lot more spacious."

Mike Mayo, vice president of the Ken Ebert design group of Manhattan, said he tried to create a spacious atmosphere when designing the new food court.

"There were several design criteria that we looked at," Mayo said. "We wanted to double the size of the existing food court and open it up from the standpoint of making it bright and attractive.

"We also had to make sure it fit the food-court concept, much like one you would see at a mall, because private vendors were going to come in and we wanted to allow them to have their own space they could control, but still make sure it was a combined effort."

The food court now offers private vendors, such as Burger King, Taco Bell, Chick-fil-A and Manchu Wok, as well as several stations for more nutritional foods like fruit and sandwiches.

"I eat lunch here every day, so it is nice to have a variety," Jon Smajda, junior in political science, said. "It is tempting to go for the fast food, but since they offer the more nutritional items in the same place it is easier to control that urge. I try and limit myself to Taco Bell and Burger King once a week."

Pitts said the food court is going beyond just being a place to eat.

"We are finding that is more than a meal function — it is now becoming more of a place to gather for students," Pitts said.

"They are making it more of an event by walking around and taking their time on deciding what they want to eat. Students also are meeting their friends there and making it a place to socialize. It is serving a purpose way beyond what we expected."

Dedication of Union scheduled for Friday

By APRIL MIDDLETON
Kansas State Collegian

Friday has been scheduled as the Renovation Dedication Celebration to highlight the accomplishments of the near-complete two-year K-State Student Union enhancement and Union Plaza project.

The $11.5 million interior renovation project was completed in September.

Bernard Pitts, executive director of the Union, said there are several people scheduled to make remarks during the program, including President Jon Wefald.

Pitts said invitations were sent to campus organizations, and former student officers, as well as many others.

"We've sent the invitations. The program should be informative and exciting," Pitts said. "We are hoping for a good turnout."

The formal dedication program is scheduled for 11:30 a.m. on the Plaza. The Men's Glee Club will perform at 11:25 a.m. During the program a plaque, time capsule and a new program will be unveiled.

Activities will be scheduled for the entire day including Union tours, entertainment and specials in the Union Food Court and retail areas. Tours also will be scheduled for Saturday morning.

Cindie Snyder, Union marketing and promotions manager, said the tours offered probably will benefit students the most.

"We want students to use the Union and become familiar with the services and space it has to offer," Snyder said. "We hope students will use this opportunity to familiarize themselves with the union."

Snyder said the day was set up with students in mind. Activities were staggered throughout the day so that students would have a chance to attend.

"It's the student Union," Snyder said. "Hopefully, students will take advantage of the day. The Union was built by students for students."

The Renovation Dedication Celebration was organized, Snyder said, so that it would be both informative and entertaining.

"This is more than a dedication," Pitts said. "This is most definitely going to be a day of celebration."

Michael Rottinghaus, president of Union Program Council, said everyone on campus should attempt to come take advantage of the specials that will be put on and see a small piece of K-State history.

"Anyone who saw the Union before the renovation and now will definitely notice a huge difference," Rottinghaus said. "This is only the second time the Union has been renovated. It's a piece of K-State history students can see and participate in."

Pitts said the two-year project required the efforts of everyone on campus. A celebration, Pitts said, definitely is in order.

"This has been a major task," Pitts said. "In order to pull it off, everyone had to be patient and flexible. We just want to make a special day of rewarding those efforts and accomplishments."

Stores, services updated as part of remodeling

EVAN SEMON/Collegian

The Coffee/Sweet Shop is an added snack stop for K-State students to take a break between classes.

Union Copy Center — January 2000
Location — first floor

Formerly located in the Computer Store's current location, the Copy Center moved next to the relocated Commerce Bank.

The Copy Center offers laser printing, black and white printing, color printing, zip disks and many other products and services.

In September, a computing lab was opened in the store. What used to be available to students were two PCs and two Macintoshes — both older models — and were available for a fee. At the new computing lab, 10 brand-new Gateway PCs are available to students. And, because of K-State's student technology fee, the cost to use them is nothing.

Carrie Mitchell, assistant bookstore manager, said being able to offer the computer use was exciting.

"That was nice because it was a service we talked about offering to students because they are here so much," Mitchell said.

She said the store's new size was an advantage to students.

"The Copy Center before was so small. By enlarging it, we've been able to bring in so many more services," she said.

She said they are able to produce more professional-looking class packets because they are now able to scan them and clean them up. Another thing she said was nice about the store is that there's a window in the back that attaches to the bookstore. So, students can pick up their class packets while getting their books in the bookstore.

"They work hand-in-hand," she said.

Commerce Bank — January 2000
Location — first floor

The full-service bank, formerly located across from the food court, relocated next to the K-State ID Center.

Bernard Pitts, executive director of the Union, said the bank has seen an increase in customers since its relocation.

"The way first floor is arranged as wide open, they're getting impulse and destination traffic," he said.

Pitts said the current statistics on the store were that about 40 percent of K-State students have accounts with the bank.

Cats' Den — Feb. 14, 2000
Location — first floor

In a naming contest, the Cats' Den was the final choice picked for the K-State Student Union's new specialty retail shop. The shop, formerly the information counter, now offers a large variety of products to students.

A few of the products available include candy, beverages, health and beauty aids, magazines, clothing, hot dogs and popcorn. The store provides film developing and K-State novelties as well.

When the idea for the store began, it was decided that the store's design would be different than any others. For that reason, a design group was hired, and the final design was one of the most modern the Union renovation experienced, said Cindie Snyder, Union marketing and promotions manager.

Suspended lights and suspended purple structures adorn the store.

"We didn't just want a cookie-cutter design store. We wanted something different," said Bernard Pitts, executive director of the Union. "It's a signature place in the Union."

Computer Store — June 5, 2000
Location — first floor

Moving out of the bookstore, the Computer Store branched out into its own space. With more room, the store is able to offer more products to students.

"By making it its own entity, it can service its customers so much better," Carrie Mitchell, assistant bookstore manager, said.

She said because of the expanded size, they were able to obtain a contract with Gateway computers. Before, they only had Macintoshes for sale.

"It will be a huge benefit to students," Mitchell said.

They also are able to carry more supplies now, and can special order computers for students, so that they have all the special features the student wants.

The store carries a variety of goods including computers, software, scanners and calculators.

Emily Hutchins, senior in advertising, said the Computer Store's new location is much better than before.

"It's less crowded because you don't have the bookstore traffic," she said.

Hutchins said she purchased her computer printer there, and that not only did she get one-on-one attention, but that they gave her a really good deal.

"It was a good price with incentives," she said

Coffee/Sweet Shop — June 28, 2000
Location — first floor

With the intent of creating a cross between a European sidewalk cafe and a coffee shop, the Coffee/Sweet Shop was constructed.

It has no doors or even any walls. Its corner position allows students to be able to see most of the Union's first floor.

It offers Starbucks and Farmer Brothers' coffee brands, espressos, cappuccino, pastries, bagels, cookies, deserts, smoothies and pretzels.

It is located where the Commerce Bank and K-State ID Center used to be.

"We thought it would be a place where people could have fun gathering there, and that's what happened," Union Director Bernard Pitts said. "It's becoming another gathering spot on campus."

ATM, Postal Service Center — July 2000
Location — lower level

Expanding from three to five ATMs, the Service Center remodeling began in May and ended two months later. Two banks were added, and the Postal Center was remodeled.

The additional banks have been an advantage for many students.

"I'm really glad I can go to my bank's ATM machine and not have to pay a fee anymore," Megan Billing, senior in advertising, said.

The Capital Federal Savings Bank and First Savings Bank were added to the already existent Intrust Bank, Commerce Bank and Kansas State Bank.

The Postal Center, in its own room, is self-serve and includes stamp machines, scales and a mail depository. A Federal Express and Airborne Express depository are across from the ATM center.

Union Hair Care Center — July 18, 2000
Location — recreation level

A survey conducted among students after several Union renovations found that a hair-care center was one of the top requests for Union additions.

First opening with only one stylist, the store has now expanded to four. Each one is professionally licensed and can style and take care all types of hair.

Sequita Tillman, hair stylist, said so far the store has been a success.

"We've had a lot of customers," she said. "But I still don't think a lot of people know about it."

Tillman said she expects to get more customers and return customers as the year continues. The idea of having a hair-care center in the Union has generated a positive response, she said.

"Everybody loves it. They say it's very convenient," she said. "They say they can stop by in between classes and don't have to search around in Aggieville to find somewhere to get their hair done."

Construction employees work earlier this year at the site of the Hair Care Center in the basement of the K-State Student Union.

Cats' Pause — September 2000
Location — second floor

French doors with Powercats etched in the glass open to the room. In front of an encased fire place are green leather chairs and a coffee table. Couches, chairs and tables fill the rest of the room.

Its purpose? Bernard Pitts, Union Director, said the Cats' Pause offers a place to students where they could sit, relax or study.

"It is the official living room to our campus," Pitts said. "We wanted to create a very similar environment to your living room at home."

He said until this room was constructed, the Union really didn't have a nice lounge. He described former lounges airport spaces.

"This place is exclusively a lounge," he said. "So far, it's been used quite a bit."

He said that when designing the room, they wanted to go full out. They decided to get upscale furniture, doors and the gas fireplace.

In the future, he said the Lounge might be used as a place for upscale meetings and events.

Bookstore introduces new merchandise

By NANCY HULL
Kansas State Collegian

Buying textbooks has become just one of several reasons to visit the K-State Union Bookstore.

Since the store expanded and reopened Feb. 29, it has gained a variety of art supplies, everyday merchandise, backpacks, greeting cards and clothing. The textbook department has increased by 20 percent and includes more magazines and seating areas.

Kathy Yates, merchandise division manager for the bookstore, said the store has been ordering merchandise based on what students say they like and want.

"Lots of things that we've been trying to introduce have become popular," Yates said. "We're trying to get people to think about coming here for those new things."

Kay Farley, assistant Union director/retail manager and bookstore manager, said the first back-to-school rush in the new store this fall went well, and they identified areas that needed changes.

"We were able to have two separate areas set up with cash registers, and the lines flowed much faster than before," Farley said.

Farley said another convenience is how the Union Copy Center now is connected to the bookstore. During the fall rush, students were able to pick up their course packets and buy their books at one place.

Susan Henderson, sophomore in life sciences, said buying her back-to-school supplies at the bookstore was easier this semester.

"The registers are now less confusing, and it seems like they're a lot closer to everything else now," Henderson said.

She said the store is more organized this semester than it was when it opened in the spring.

"At first you had to look around, and now everything's in its own section," she said.

Farley said the store is in the process of having a full-time greeter at the front of the store to welcome customers and point them in the right direction.

The new mix of clothing at the front of the store also has attracted students, Farley said.

"The clothing is more fashionable, and we have the styles and colors students wanted instead of just purple," she said. "During Family Weekend, parents were looking for the purple clothing, but all the students liked the orange and gold shirts."

The bookstore is constantly changing to assist students, said Carrie Mitchell, assistant bookstore manager and book division manager.

KELLY GLASSCOCK/Collegian

Sharol Warner, sophomore in psychology, packs boxes in the K-State Union Bookstore last fall so that the store could be relocated to the second floor while it was remodeled.

"There were a lot of things about the design that looked good on paper, and once we got in here with customers we had to make some changes," Mitchell said.

Rearranging has been done to stretch departments out so items are easier to find, and shelves have been angled differently to display certain items.

"We've also been moving our staff around to make them more efficient," Mitchell said.

Mitchell said positive word-of-mouth about the store has spread from customers.

"When alumni are here or people are around for conferences, they drift in. People have been pleased and they pass it on," she said. "After three years of listening to a jackhammer and putting up with construction, seeing the students enjoy the store makes it all worthwhile."

Plans for Union renovations under way since 1993

By JAMIE BARRETT
Kansas State Collegian

In 1923, K-State administration, faculty and students had a vision for a center of student life. In 1956, the vision became a reality when the K-State Student Union opened its doors for the first time.

PETERSON

Now, in the year 2000, the Union has became not only a center for student life, but a social, recreational, educational and cultural pillar for the university.

The Union Enhancement Project began in June 1998 after nearly six years of discussion and a vote from the student body. The project was recommended by the Student Governing Association in 1994 after extensive research on the topic.

Ed Skoog, student body president during the 1993-94 academic year, said planning for the enhancement project included a lot of time and people.

"We toured many other universities' unions to get ideas of what we wanted for our own," Skoog said. "There were a lot of people that donated their time and effort into working towards the project."

After discussion with union officials, the Union Governing Board and administration, Skoog said the enhancement project was put into a referendum to be passed by SGA.

"The referendum that was written in 1994 did not pass at first," Skoog said. "It only failed by about two points, so at that point I had a tough decision to make. I decided to go ahead and make the recommendation and I know I made the right decision."

Skoog said the enhancement project was something that needed to be done, but many people opposed it at the time due to a rise in student fees.

"The Union was in a state of disrepair," Skoog said. "It was out of date, falling apart and I felt as though it was a priority. There were people that thought I made the wrong decision because student fees went up $13."

Skoog said the criticism to the enhancement project was legitimate, but if there was more opposition, he would have rethought the decision to recommend it.

"The project came about during a time of intense taxation," Skoog said. "There was a new athletic fee that was already being imposed upon students. I think the opposition was legitimate, but there was no effort to appeal and no effort to stop the project."

Jeff Peterson, student body president in 1995-96, said he was skeptical of the idea at first but he changed the way he thought by the end of his term.

"When we first ran we were skeptical of the project," Peterson said. "It had been approved before we were there, so the role we played in it was the planning. It was a key part of the development because we were deciding on what students would use."

Becca Korphage, Student Senate member in 1995 and 1996, said she was part of some of the planning committees and found the process to be student-friendly.

"We were very concerned with what students wanted," Korphage said. "One my favorite things we did was when we put a huge bulletin board up in the Union and asked students to write on it what they thought their ideal Union would be. We got a lot of great responses and got many of the ideas from that."

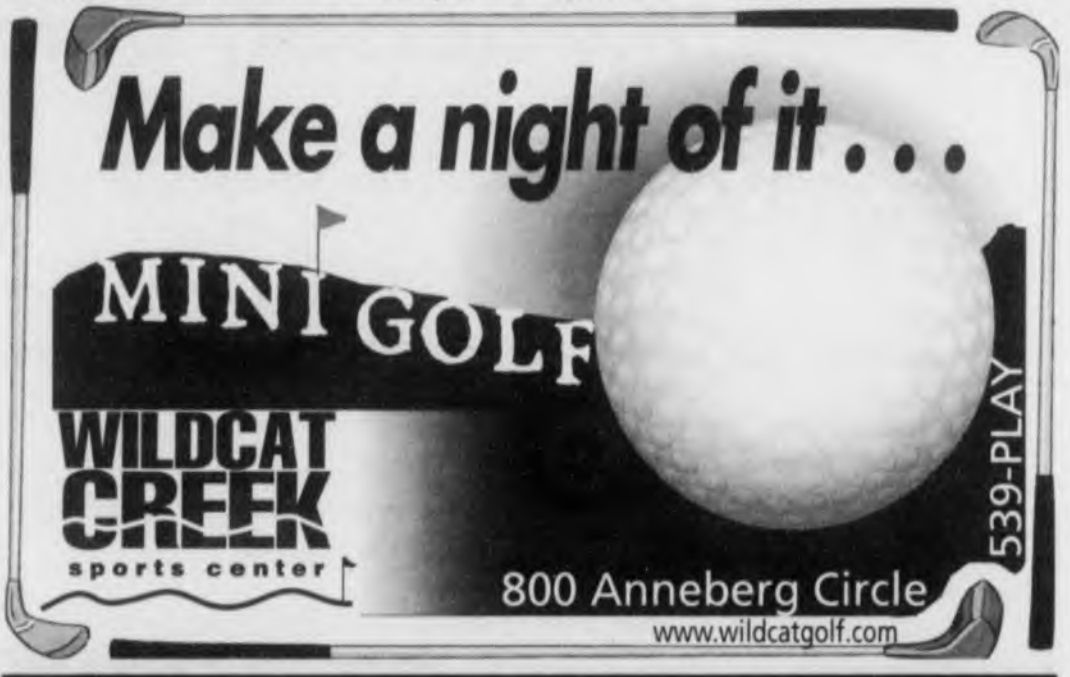
Korphage said the Union Enhancement Project was controversial to some people because they were not looking towards how it could benefit people in the future.

"At that time we were pushing hard for people to support it," she said. "It was hard to sell the idea to a lot of people because it was such futuristic thinking."

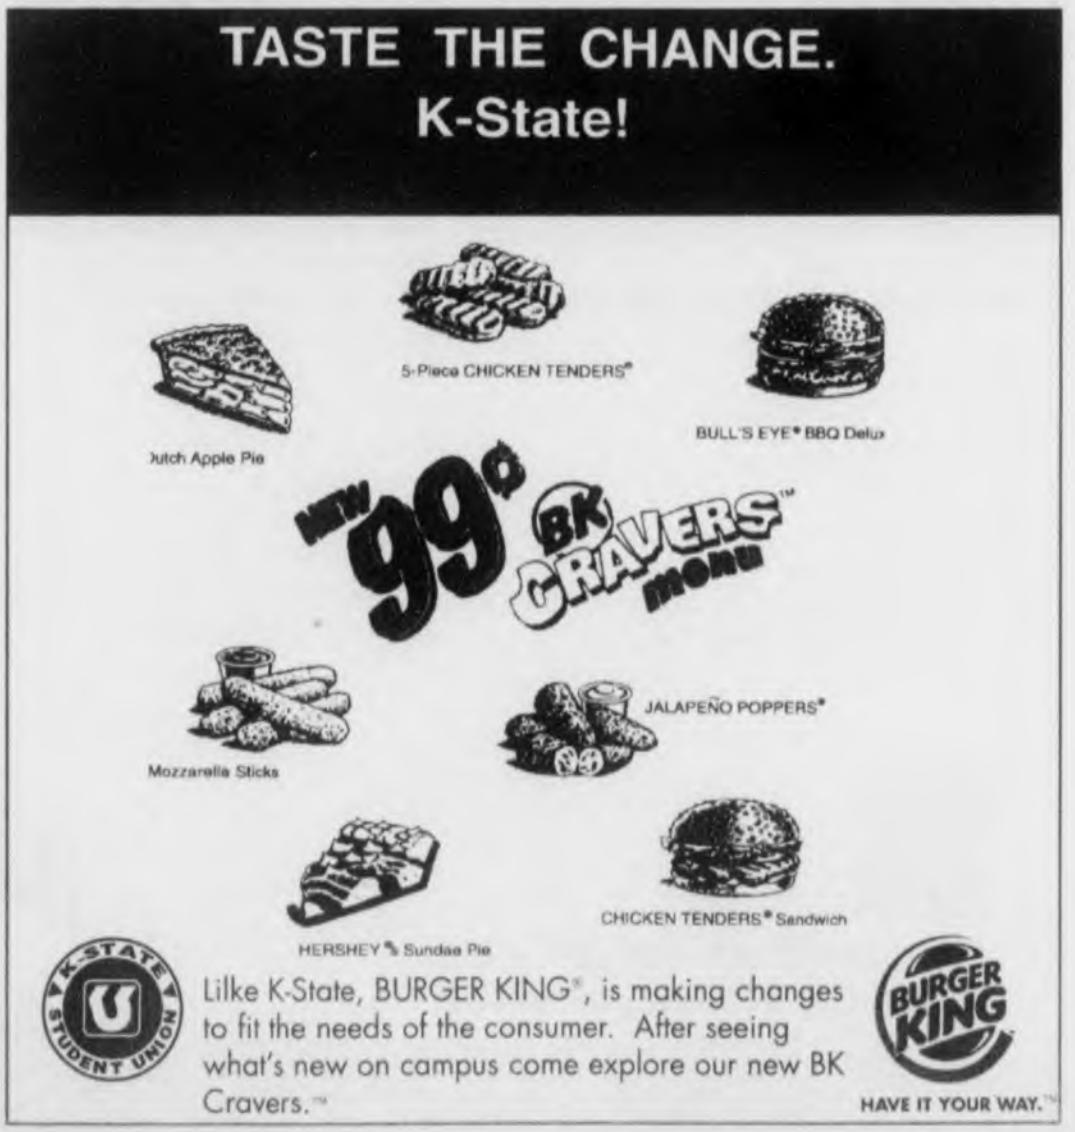
Meredith Mein, Union Governing Board president in 1994-95 and 1995-96, said she thought the enhancement project was a positive thing for most students.

"I think students were opposed to the fee increase at first, but when they realized this was something much better and more accessible they realized it was well worth it," she said.

Mein said she felt the Union needed enhancement badly, both as a student and a member of UGB.



"There were a lot of things the Union needed," she said. "Cosmetic things needed to be addressed as well as the updating of services. A new generation was using the Union, and we needed to change things in order to serve them."



Skoog said he thinks the enhancement project was timely because it was at a time when the university was becoming more involved with athletics and the project is a good way to improve the university without focusing on athletics.

"The campus is very involved with athletics," Skoog said. "In 1994, the football team was starting to get big, so it was a good time to improve the school outside of the athletic program."

Peterson said the overall project is something in which he said he is proud to have been involved.

"I am glad that people had the vision and the foresight to do this," Peterson said. "The decisions we had to make back then are key to what we see today."

Congratulations

5 projects excluded from renovation

By BRYAN SCRIBNER
Kansas State Collegian

Only five projects of the $12.3 million dream did not become reality.

The complete make-over of the K-State Student Union did not include a water feature, outside dining area, covered stage, bicycle racks or landscaping.

Union director Bernard Pitts said financial limitations terminated these Union Plaza projects.

Pitts said the five renovations were part of the original enhancement project plan. He said the courtyard was allotted $1.2 million.

"We had to establish priorities," Pitts said. "The enhancement committee had the vision, but unfortunately, we didn't have all the money."

Before the Union's appearance was refurbished, Pitts said the building had to be brought up to code. Requirements set by the Americans with Disabilities Act had to be met, water and sewer lines had to be replaced and asbestos had to be removed.

"All that stuff that is behind the wall. You really can't see, but we had to take care of it," Pitts said.

Building engineer John Frese said 25 percent of these enhancements were electrical. Motors, valves and electrical panels were replaced. Frese also said some transformers and other mechanical additions were not funded.

"There were some that I thought would make my job easier and the Union more efficient," Frese said.

The original plan envisioned by the enhancement committee totaled more than $40 million, but Pitts said the project was able to maximize the funding it received. The remodeling effort was spread throughout the entire structure.

"Overall, I'm certainly satisfied," Pitts said. "I think we got a lot from our money."

Pitts said he is hopeful the new design will allow the Union to maintain a budget allowing for annual upgrades.

"We think that some of the improvements are going to allow us to manage our expenses more efficiently," he said.

Many of the unfinished enhancement projects will be placed on the Union's five-year capital plan, and could be completed in the future, Pitts said.

He said funding for the additions might not be attained, though, because it would be collected only through revenues.

The enhancement's were not inexpensive, Pitts said. He said enhancement planners provided quality improvements to the structure.

"We didn't want to short-sell our students," Pitts said.

The project utilized two general contractors and about 70 subcontractors. Pitts said the enhancement benefited from strong craftsmanship.

Carrie Mitchell, assistant manager of the K-State Union Bookstore, said student appreciation for the revamped building has been encouraging.

"It is such an excellent feeling when students come in and have a reaction to the Union," she said.

5 dead following terrorist bombing

■ American soldiers missing following explosion from ship headed for Arabian Peninsula.

By ROBERT BURNS
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — An apparent terrorist bomb tore into a U.S. Navy destroyer Thursday, killing at least five Americans and leaving 12 missing, the Defense Department said. Authorities said the explosion was triggered by a small boat that was assisting in mooring the ship in Yemen on the Arabian Peninsula.

President Clinton said the attack on the USS Cole, one of the world's most advanced warships, appeared to be an act of terrorism.

He dispatched to Yemen investigative teams from the FBI, the State Department and the Pentagon.

Defense Secretary William Cohen said no one had claimed responsibility for the attack, which also injured 36.

Cohen said he knew of no other specific threats against U.S. forces in the region, but said he ordered an increased alert level for all U.S. forces around the world, including those in the United States.

"Our vigilance cannot eliminate all risk," Cohen said, while praising the Cole's crew for responding quickly to the explosion and stabilizing the ship even as water rushed into the main engine room and other compartments.

Accident kills unlicensed Wamego teen

By BRYAN MURPHY
Kansas State Collegian

A one-car accident in Manhattan killed an underage driver Wednesday evening.

Dean W. Novy, 14, Wamego, was driving east on Zeandale Road just after 6:30 p.m. when he veered into the westbound lane and rolled his vehicle several times. Novy was thrown from the car and pronounced dead at the scene, said Shayleen Brown, patrol secretary with the Riley County Police Department.

Passenger Donald R. Thibodeau, 19, Wamego, was transported to Mercy Hospital for treatment and released.

Neither Novy nor Thibodeau were wearing a seatbelt at the time of the accident, Brown said.

Fort Riley soldier dies in Kuwait

By BRYAN MURPHY
Kansas State Collegian

A Fort Riley soldier stationed in Kuwait died of an apparent suicide Tuesday morning.

Details of the death of Sgt. Mark Klein, 30, of Killeen, Texas, cannot be released during preliminary investigations, said Christie Vanover, media relations assistant for Fort Riley.

Klein, a soldier with Troop H, 1st Cavalry, had been deployed to Kuwait with Task Force 2-70th Armor in mid-August. He joined the U.S. Army in November 1992 and was sent to Fort Riley in February 1999, where he worked as a scout section sergeant.

Although Klein's death is being treated as a suicide, an investigation has been organized, and is ongoing as to potential causes and details concerning what happened.

Senate discusses activities center

By BRYAN SCRIBNER
Kansas State Collegian

Students might decide if they will pay an additional $6.50 privilege fee for the next 15 years.

A bill that would give students an opportunity to vote on the construction of a student activities center was introduced at Student Senate on Thursday night. Final action on the bill will be Oct. 19.

The center would cost $4.8 million. Student Body President Jake Worcester said students would be responsible for about $1.8 million.

This funding, Worcester said, would be acquired through a 15-year bond. Students would pay $218,000 per year.

The remainder of the funding would come from a privilege fee surplus of about $750,000 and about $2.1 million in excess university revenues.

A fee surplus is accumulated in the privilege fee reserves account, which was started three years ago to aid campus organizations in need of emergency funding. University revenues are generated as a result of increased student enrollment.

Voting would take place at one polling location Nov. 9 in the K-State Student Union. Sixty-percent approval of those that vote must be acquired, Worcester said.

The paper ballot would ask students if they would agree to pay the fee and if they would allow for the privilege fee surplus to contribute to the project.

Privilege fees fund student services such as the Chester E. Peters Recreational Complex. Students enrolled in at least 12 hours were charged $257 in fees this semester.

Business Sen. Sara Hayhurst said students must be provided with information from the Privilege Fees Committee and those in charge of the center's development.

"The ideology behind it is a very good plan," she said. "I think it is important for President Worcester and Vice President (Dana) Pracht and the committee to inform the students on what all this entails."

If students approve the project, Worcester said the KSU Foundation would commit to a $.5 million fund-raising

Student wins trip for having the LOUDEST MOUTH

Dusty Fanning, fifth-year senior in agronomy, donned his chef hat and shoulder pads to win the Screaming Fan Halls of Fame contest Thursday night at Rusty's Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon.

Fanning, known as "Fan-dog" to his friends, said he participated in the contest because he just wanted to have a good time.

"I'm here because I'm a true K-State fan," Fanning said. "I'm here to have a good time and I want everyone to have a good time with me."

The good times came when the manufacturer of Halls cough drops brought its Decibel Dome to Manhattan in search of the loudest college football fan in the country. Dirk Gerdes, a Halls representative, said the company chose Manhattan because of K-State's rivalry with Oklahoma.

"We wanted to get some of the biggest rivalries," Gerdes said. "We wanted to get K-State and Oklahoma because it's a big rivalry and because of the importance of the rankings."

MORE INFO

Fanning won an all-expenses-paid trip to the College Football Hall of Fame in South Bend, Ind., where he will compete in the Halls Bowl against the 15 other winners from across the nation. The winner of the Halls Bowl will win an all-expenses paid trip for two to the BCS National Championship game in Miami.

Contestants took the stage at Chance to showcase their yelling abilities and team spirit. Each contestant was judged on a team cheer and a yell. The cheers were judged on individuality, enthusiasm and creativity. Contestants then stood three feet away from the microphone and simply yelled. The Halls Decibel Dome measured the decibels of the yell. The average scream was about 102 decibels — louder than a power mower. The scores of the two were then added together for a total score.

"The loudest fan is not only one who wants to have fun, but is passionate about their team," Gerdes said. "College football fans are the most passionate in the country. They bleed their team color."

Halls began this tour not only to promote Halls, but to celebrate the people they meet.

"Halls aren't just for colds, they are also for meetings at the office, a crowded party or anything that involves voices," Gregg Goldsholl, public relations director for Halls said. "We also celebrate the people who live life loudly."

Fanning, the winner of the contest, won an all-expenses-paid trip to the College Football Hall of Fame in South Bend, Ind. There, he will compete in the Halls Bowl against the 15 other winners from across the nation. The winner of the Halls Bowl will win an all-expenses paid trip for two to the BCS National Championship game in Miami. All 16 winners will be inducted into the "Screaming Fans Halls of Fame" on display at the College Football Hall of Fame.

"I hope I do as well in Indiana as I did here," Fanning said. "I want everyone to know that K-State fans are the best."

Many of the people in attendance were there to see Fanning compete.

"Dusty is the No. 1 K-State fan," Jennifer Kirkland, senior in kinesiology, said. "I had to watch him show off his stuff. It was definitely good entertainment."

Tobe Wallace, fifth-year senior in elementary education, said the show was fun to watch, but he was there to see Fanning.

"I didn't expect anything else from Dusty," Wallace said. "I knew he'd do something crazy, because he does that every weekend tailgating."

Other contestants also drew a loud response from those in attendance. Renee McDaniel, sophomore in public relations, took the stage wearing a purple wig. She said she participated because of her mouth.

10 kidnapped by rebels in Ecuadorian oil fields

QUITO, Ecuador — Colombian rebels seized a helicopter from an oil field in the Amazon jungle early Thursday, kidnapping 10 foreigners aboard, military officials said.

Six Americans, a Chilean, an Argentine and the two Frenchmen piloting the plane were taken hostage at gunpoint at 4 a.m. in the El Coca region, 150 miles northeast of the capital, military officials said.

Vice President Pedro Pinto said the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia, Colombia's largest guerrilla group, claimed responsibility, calling it a reprisal for Plan Colombia. Plan Colombia is an anti-narcotics initiative backed by a $1.3 billion U.S. aid package.

However, Pinto listed the hostages as two pilots and seven passengers, one of them believed to be Ecuadorean. The differing reports could not be reconciled immediately.

A spokesman for the rebel group refused to confirm or deny the reported claim.

The oil field, operated by Spanish energy giant Repsol YPF SA, lies in Ecuador's northern territory bordering Colombia's largest cocaine-producing region.

Radio reports speculated that the helicopter, seized just 60 miles from the border, was flown to Colombia after being commandeered.

Rebels and paramilitaries are vying for control of vast coca fields and millions of dollars in tax proceeds for whichever armed group controls the area.

Last September, another armed group seized eight oil workers — eight Canadians, three Spaniards and an American — from an oil-rich jungle area north of Thursday's kidnapping site.

The last of those hostages were freed months later, but it was never confirmed if a ransom was paid and the kidnappers were not identified.

F-16 fighter jet crashes in cow pasture; pilot safe

ATLANTA, Kan. — An F-16 fighter jet from the Oklahoma Air National Guard crashed Thursday in a southeast Kansas cow pasture. The pilot ejected safely before impact, officials said.

The jet, leading a four-plane formation from the guard's Tulsa base, went down about 2:30 p.m. about four miles east of Atlanta in Cowley County, said Lt. Col. Pat Scully of the Oklahoma National Guard.

"They were on an air-to-air training mission," Scully said. "This is a routine type of mission."

Authorities cordoned off a one-mile radius around the crash scene, which was contaminated by an unspecified chemical — not fuel — aboard the jet, said Cowley County Sheriff Bob Odell.

A hazardous materials team from McConnell Air Force Base in Wichita was called to the site. No homes are in the area of the crash, so no evacuations were necessary, Odell said.

The cause of the crash has not been determined. Training missions routinely fly over Kansas, Scully said.

The pilot, a major whose name was not released, was in good condition, Scully said. He was picked up by Oklahoma guard officials and was being taken back to Tulsa.

Odell said the pilot was limping slightly and complaining of neck injuries but had declined immediate treatment.

Worker who discovered flaw in shuttle honored

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. — A NASA engineer who spied a 4-inch pin wedged against space shuttle Discovery's fuel tank will get a medal for quite possibly saving the lives of seven astronauts who are now en route to the international space station.

Jorge Rivera, 43, was a reluctant hero Thursday, saying he was just doing his job of the past 19 years.

He spotted the pin shortly before the shuttle was supposed to lift off Tuesday night. The launch was scrubbed, the pin was removed, and Discovery finally blasted off Wednesday night on NASA's 100th shuttle flight.

Rivera said "God only knows what could have happened" if he hadn't seen the pin and it had ricocheted into an engine at liftoff.

NASA halted Tuesday's countdown after Rivera spotted the pin with binoculars from 50 feet away. The pin had been dropped there by someone, perhaps days or even weeks earlier. Rivera went home, got four hours of sleep and was back at the launch pad long before dawn Wednesday to remove the pin and its attached cord.

Woman promotes acceptance of homosexuality

By ERIN SCHNEWEIS
Kansas State Collegian

NATIONAL COMING OUT WEEK

As an 18-year-old freshman at the University of Kansas, Gladys Hanna began to recognize emotions that suggested she had feelings for women.

Then came the added difficulty of telling her parents she was a lesbian.

Hanna, junior in social work, has always been open with her family, and told her parents when she was in her late teens. She now is 26, and has been out for about eight years.

Her mother, Atina Hanna, said the news was somewhat shocking.

"We were a little sad because we haven't been down that road before," Atina Hanna said.

The Hannas' initial response was concern for their daughter's safety. They said they also wondered how the rest of society would accept her.

"Then there was a second wave of reaction between her father and I," Atina Hanna said. "We wondered, 'What can we do to support her?' 'What can we do to comfort her?'"

After she told her parents, she had two long-term relationships with men.

At the age of 23, when she lived in Seattle, she discovered she preferred transgendered women, or women who dress like men. She moved to Arizona, met a woman, fell in love and then moved to Denver, where they lived together for two years.

Hanna said there was an emotional connection with this woman unlike any she had ever experienced before.

"From my own experience, I had a much closer emotional relationship than I've ever been able to have with men," she said.

Hanna then brought her partner home to meet her family. She said the level of discomfort everyone experienced was the same as if she had brought home a new boyfriend.

"I think my parents were a little nervous, just because it was a new experience, but it went well," Hanna said.

She said the public displays of affection she had with her heterosexual relationships gave her a sense of confidence to continue those same levels of tenderness with her partner. Hanna said when they visited Manhattan, people generally were accepting.

"I never really felt any major hostility," she said. "It was more like we were a curiosity, something different."

For Hanna, loving a woman is no different than the feelings experienced when loving a man.

"I think that it is exactly the same," she said. "It's the same kind of desire, or ideals, it just happens to be with someone of the same sex instead of someone of the opposite sex."

Things have changed since she has moved back to her hometown of Manhattan. The relationship with her partner was terminated because Hanna wanted to finish her education.

Hanna has became more active in her role of educating others. Since her return home around three months ago, she has joined panels and is a member of the Queer Straight Alliance.

"This is the first I felt like I really needed to be in an activist group," she said.

Ryan Gove, graduate student in college student personnel, said he has attended QSA meetings and been on panels with Hanna.

Gove's opinion of Hanna is high.

"She seems like a very open person and very unique," he said.

Hanna said she realizes that most people don't agree with her lifestyle, especially those whose religion forbids it, but she feels that there should be equal respect between them.

"You cannot agree with it, but you should respect the basic level of human rights that we all have," she said.

Atina Hanna said she hopes parents who find out their child is gay, lesbian, bisexual or transgendered will continue to care for their children regardless of their sexual orientation.

"The love, support and strength you had before you found out needs to continue," Atina Hanna said. "You need to assure them that you love them as much as you did when they were born."

Atina Hanna said education is something that will bring forth acceptance, but it should exist longer than National Coming Out Week.

"Awareness is a continuous thing. It should not just be one week, it should be ongoing," she said.

Wet T-shirt portion of fund-raising party canceled

By SARAH BAHARI
Kansas State Collegian

A fraternity-sponsored event scheduled for this weekend has been modified by the group's adviser after he deemed it to be inappropriate and degrading to women.

Omega Psi Phi, a black fraternity, planned to have a wet T-shirt contest as part of a fund-raiser dance Saturday night in Union Station.

When adviser Erick Harper caught word of the event earlier this week, he said he immediately canceled the wet T-shirt portion of the party.

"I was not aware of it until the flier was brought to my attention," he said. "It was inappropriate. It was degrading to women and borderlines on being sexist."

Fraternity president Mikail Abdel-Khaliq said although he received some negative responses, he never intended the event to anger people.

"The contest was nothing more than a marketing tool," he said. "I didn't know it was going to cause controversy or offend anybody."

Abdel-Khaliq said he registered the event with the K-State Student Union more than a month ago as a Halloween party. It wasn't decided until about two weeks later to incorporate the wet T-shirt contest.

Union officials could not be reached for comment, but Abdel-Khaliq said they were not aware of the contest.

PARTY INFO

The party is from 10 p.m. to 1:30 a.m. in the Union Station. There is an entrance fee of $4 or $3 with a canned good. Canned good proceeds go to the Flint Hills Breadbasket

Dory Branch, member of Ordinary Women, a campus feminist group, said she thought it was a good decision to cancel the contest.

"I think, first off, it would have been tremendously inappropriate," she said. "It's not the best environment for women on campus. It shows a general disrespect for what women bring to this university besides their bodies."

While some were offended, Abdel-Khaliq said there also were positive responses. About 25 women had entered the contest, and about 4,000 fliers were handed out around the city of Manhattan.

"A lot of people liked it," he said. "A lot of people were going to participate, and the people who weren't participating were coming just to see who would be."

One reason the contest was added to the fund-raiser was to provide entertainment since the party is non-alcoholic, Abdel-Khaliq said.

"People in Manhattan aren't too keen on going to parties without beer, even if it's for charity," he said. "You need some sort of marketing tool."

The organization should have evaluated the consequences before planning the idea, Branch said.

"When groups are coming up with marketing schemes or fund raisers, it's their responsibility to look at how it would reflect on their organization and their university," she said.

Student Senate should clarify center's benefits

If members of Student Senate want to make the student activities center a reality, they need to show the K-State campus why it is a necessary addition.

Step one is to keep the student body informed about the project. Student Senate needs to show students why this structure will benefit not only a selected few organizations but the majority of the campus. If every student must pay an additional $6.50 per semester in privilege fees, then they should see what their money is going to give them.

Step two is to show students why the activities center is right for our university, rather than why a building of this type has worked for other schools.

Student Senate needs to remind the 300-plus organizations on our campus that they will not automatically get an office in the new center. These organizations should know that there will only be room for 126 cubicles, not enough room for many of the campus' groups and organizations.

The campus needs to know why Student Senate believes these cubicles will be more than part-time desk space and an outlet for voice mail.

Let's focus on purpose first, then on funding. Students deserve to know everything about the activities center — the positive and the negative aspects.

Reforming Homecoming week

Mandatory events put stranglehold on those few involved

The worst the greek system has to offer will be on display next week.

No, the elephant walk and other long-denied greek hazing rituals will not be on display. Next week is the week many greeks and independents alike have come to dread — Homecoming week.

JOSEPH HURLA

Most independents look at Homecoming just as an annoyance: strange chants emanating from the sorority down the street, countless greeks adorned in matching homecoming jackets and weeklong greek bacchanalia that will prevent many members of the greek community from making it to class more than sporadically.

Independents have come to view the week as geared toward greeks and largely exclusive. While independents can become involved in Homecoming week, few actually do. Some say this is because independents have less school spirit, but the more logical reason is that greeks are required to participate and independents are not.

To many independents, Homecoming week is no more than a blip on their semester schedule, highlighted by a few more toilet-papered sorority houses.

Greeks have more reasons to despise the week.

Homecoming week is the most wasteful drain of time K-State has to offer. The week is filled with parties, meetings, events and practices for events — often with attendance required — that prevent fraternity and sorority members from focusing on what the greek community claims is its top priority: academics.

Academics become secondary when Homecoming rolls around. Greeks switch their focus to the mandatory events at hand, competitions that have no real purpose but offer an opportunity to gain bragging rights for a few days.

Perhaps the most vivid example of the absurdity of the week is Pant the Chant.

Pant the Chant is a spirit activity that involves combining required key phrases into a chant with actions and movements. The actual event lasts only about two hours. Preparation, however, lasts several weeks. Some greek organizations practice five to six days a week for the event.

This practice consumes hours of students' time during the middle of the semester, but represents only a fraction of the time students will waste during Homecoming.

In the past, the most time-consuming event was the bodybuilding competition. Greek Affairs, however, wisely chose to delete this event from the homecoming competition. While the main reason was safety of participants, a secondary reason was the strain practicing for the event took on students' time.

Pant the Chance quickly stepped in to replace body building. It now is regarded as the week's high point and now zaps time.

This is where Greek Affairs needs to step in.

Greek Affairs should realize that, if it truly wants to be an organization that benefits students, it must impose some limitations. Practice time should be limited, and those limitations should be enforced. Additionally, Greek Affairs should strive to ensure that the purpose of Homecoming week is achieved. Homecoming week is, in theory, worthwhile. The week is supposed to increase spirit among students about the university, specifically sports.

In practice, however, it is about long parties, meaningless games and matching jackets.

Women's actions, comments confuse opposite sex

I feel sorry for you men out there, honestly, I do.

You can't win.

How are you supposed to know what to do in terms of the opposite sex?

ERIN SCHNEWEIS

Will the woman you have the privilege of dating be offended if you open the car door for her? Will she be offended if you don't open the door at the restaurant?

The same can be said when the check arrives for dinner. Should you offer to pay for everything or does she think she should pay for her steak? Will she think you are cheap or socially correct for offering to go dutch?

These are just some of the problems the male sex encounters in dating. The real strain comes to them when the relationship begins.

For instance when men ask if there is anything wrong. And the answer is, "nothing," but it is said with a sigh, or "the look," that proves there is something wrong. A lot of young women, myself included, will be upset when the man gives up asking. How could he not automatically know what the problem is?

Then there are the issues that are brought forth with compliments.

If a man says, "You look pretty tonight," nine times out of 10 the girl will retort something along the lines of, "Do I not look pretty every night?"

There are problems with focusing on one particular item in terms of praising as well. When a man says, "I love your legs," the woman often automatically questions why he doesn't love her stomach, her eyes, her hair, and the list goes on.

Then again, the compliment can't be too vague, either. It can't be so broad that it fits everyone, it needs to be personalized.

Men, it seems, can't win.

The worst thing for the male sex probably is the questions that the majority of men get on a daily basis. These generally are questions that have no right or wrong answers.

"Do I look fat in this?" If he answers no, chances are the woman will not believe him. God help him if he answers yes.

Then there are the infamous loaded questions.'

"Is she prettier than I am?"

"Do you not like it when I hang on you with your guy friends around?"

The majority of men I know have a different memory gland in their brains than the women I know. This can cause quite a problem.

These are the guys who can remember football scores and stats from the beginning of time. It is almost as if they have a play-by-play record of every game they have ever watched since their diaper days.

But very few of them can remember anniversaries. After all, the third- month anniversary of when a guy first spoke to his girlfriend is extremely important. How can a guy possibly forget that it was six weeks, two days and 20 minutes ago when he told his lifetime love that he cared for her in more than a friendly manner?

The majority of my male friends can remember baseball scores from 12 years ago.

However, they struggle with birthdays. They draw a blank when asked if the date is for Friday or Saturday.

It is not that we women don't have to struggle with the opposite sex. Trust me, we do. This can be found true in terms of how women and men deal with various romantic troubles.

When one of my friends and I have issues with members of the opposite sex, we analyze everything over a hot fudge sundae, a few beers or some nachos with a large group of our friends. We sympathize, we gripe and offer our advice — with delicate wording.

Guys who are in similar situations tend to play basketball or go out with the guys for a beer.

If they trust one guy, they might mention that things aren't going well. Maybe a few slight details, but nothing longer than a few minutes worth of time. And then they solve the problem.

Guys rarely sympathize with one another. Usually the advice they get from their friends is generally along the lines of dumping the girl they are with, and trust me, no tact usually is involved.

This is not necessarily a bad thing, or a right or wrong issue. It merely is a different way of looking at things; thus, a different approach to handling the situation.

When it comes down to it, I don't feel too sorry for men.

They get to absorb the physical and inner beauty of women. They get to see firsthand the intelligence, wit and loveliness of the female sex, so in a way, they automatically win.

But as long as there are problems — some imagined, some not — there always will be fold-out couches and dog houses.

Organization schedules forum for local candidate elections

Editor,

The League of Women Voters invites the public to a Candidates' Forum from 7 to 9 p.m. Thursday, Oct. 19, at the Manhattan Central Fire Station, at the corner of Denison and Kimball avenues.

Candidates participating in the Forum are: Bob Newsome (R) and Ruth Schrum (D) for Riley County Commission; Jeff Peterson (R) and Dean Stramel (D) for District 66 state representative; David Norlin (D) and Mark Taddiken (R) for District 21 state senator; and Eloise Lynch (D) and Bruce Wyatt (R) for District six State Board of Education.

Candidates will answer questions prepared by the league and from the audience.

The public can now access the League's Web site (www.interkan.net/-luv) for the candidates' statements on current issues.

A final reminder — advance voting begins on Wednesday at the County Clerk's Office in the Riley County Courthouse. Those in the campus community may register to vote at the K-State Student Union through Oct. 23.

Columnist gives inspiration to people under depression

Editor,

In a column in Wednesday's issue of the Collegian, Ken Wells spoke of his personal journey to overcome depression. After reading his story, I was inspired to share my own.

During the fall semester of my sophomore year, I was buried by feelings of empty anticipation for the future. This is not uncommon among college students who continually ask themselves where their life is going. I had been asking that same question, but when its wording changed to "Who cares?" I knew something was wrong.

I had scheduled each moment of every day with a commitment that surely would lead me to success. I was doing well in school, was involved in extracurricular activities, exercised regularly, had leadership positions, participated in community service and had plenty of friends and family who loved me. Still, none of this resulted in any fulfillment, and I felt only weary emptiness.

I began to feel angry and sullen, withdrawing emotionally from everything around me. Sometimes I simply continued numbly along my path to meet the goals I had set; at other times I could barely keep going. I was like a zombie, and I was miserable. I wanted out.

Like Ken, I did not consider suicide to be an option, but my spirit was so fractured that I couldn't see past the despair I was feeling. So I left K-State for the rest of that semester and returned to my hometown to live with my family. This was one of the most difficult decisions I have made in my life because I was quitting, something I had never done.

Then, for the first time in my life since I was a small child, I stopped constantly pressuring myself. I slowly began to quietly reflect on life. I spent a lot of time resting, reading books, going for long walks and sometimes just breathing deeply. I learned that it was ok to be alone, that slowing down and appreciating the beauty in ordinary life would greatly enhance my chance for happiness. And I began to heal.

Three years later, I still am healing. When that despair returns, I remind myself that so many other people have experienced depression, that many others are facing it now, and that too many more will have to face it in their futures. Depression doesn't discriminate; it affects people of all cultures, religions, ethnic groups, ages, genders, classes and lifestyles. It is a burden people must carry.

However, this burden can become a gift. So many wonderful people were there for me when I needed them that I couldn't even begin to list them all. They still support me, and I am grateful to them. Their compassion was an example to me, and I now can extend that love by helping others to overcome their sadness.

Thank you, Ken, for helping others by sharing your story.

YEMEN

cowardly act, Clinton told reporters at the White House that he had ordered all Navy ships in the region to pull out of port as a safety precaution.

The Cole, with a crew of about 350, was in port at Aden, Yemen, for refueling when a small craft came alongside and an explosion followed, said Lt. Cmdr. Daren Pelkie, spokesman for the Navy's 5th Fleet headquarters in Manama, Bahrain. Pelkie said the explosion occurred about 12:15 p.m. local time, or 5:15 a.m. EDT.

The explosion ripped a large hole — 20 feet by 40 feet — in the side of the 505-foot long, 8,600-ton U.S. ship, said Pentagon officials. The destroyer is built of steel and fortified with 70 tons of armor.

Adm. Vern Clark, chief of naval operations, said the attack boat had been helping moor the Navy ship at a fueling station in the middle of the Aden harbor. After returning from delivering a line to one of the buoys, the small boat turned and came directly toward the ship and struck it at midhull, he said.

"A boat that was involved in mooring would not be expected to be a threat," Clark told reporters at the Pentagon, adding, "I have no reason to think that this was anything but a senseless act of terrorism."

He said the destroyer was on Bravo alert, a moderate security alert level that requires posting guards, controlling entry and other security measures, and the Cole was in compliance.

That included armed personnel on deck as it entered the port, he said. The admiral said arrangements for assisting the Cole's refueling were made through the U.S. Embassy in Aden, as is standard procedure for any Navy ship refueling at any port in the world.

Clark said it was too early to say whether U.S. ships would continue using Aden for refueling. He said the Cole was the fourth ship to use the port this year.

The damage, at midhull along the water line, was concentrated in one of the engine rooms and adjacent eating and living quarters, and flooding was controlled quickly, Clark said.

The Cole was listing four degrees to its port side after the explosion.

The injured were taken to a local hospital and U.S. Navy medical teams were dispatched to the scene from Bahrain.

Sen. John Warner, R-Va., chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, said the attacking craft was not "put together in a garage overnight. There had to be careful planning."

He said female sailors were among the casualties. Clark confirmed this but had no other details.

Clinton had a message for those responsible for the attack: "If their intention was to deter us from our mission of promoting peace and security in the Middle East, they will fail utterly."

At the State Department, officials were preparing warnings telling Americans worldwide to be cautious in their travels and urging them to take special care and avoid crowds on the West Bank, in Gaza and in the Old City of Jerusalem. Another advisory warned against travel to Yemen.

Secretary of State Madeleine Albright talked earlier in the day with Ali Abdullah Saleh, the president of Yemen, who pledged his cooperation in the investigation.

At a State Department news conference, Albright said, "We are operating in a world that is filled with a variety of threats. But that doesn't mean that we can crawl into an ostrichlike mode. We are eagles."

It appeared to be the first attack against a U.S. Navy ship since 1991, when the USS LaSalle, a 14,650-ton command ship, was fired on with automatic weapons from two unidentified craft while deployed in the Persian Gulf.

At the Justice Department, Attorney General Janet Reno said the FBI team being dispatched to the region included investigators, explosives experts and an evidence response team.

THE PRE-SEASON PUSH

EVAN SEMON/Collegian

Freshman Donnie Wallace drives to the basket in a game last spring against Iowa State.

Men's basketball team composes foundation

By NICK BRATKOVIC
Kansas State Collegian

If the saying is true that championships are made in the pre-season, K-State men's basketball fans are in for quite a year.

School began for K-State students Aug. 21, when players entered the Jim Wooldridge School of Basketball — a school not necessarily designed with lectures, chapters to read and syllabi to memorize, but one geared in defensive philosophies, triangle offenses and the art of a weight room.

Almost immediately, the players began the fall portion of a strict off-season program, designed to help the team improve. It included weight training four days a week, alternating in the morning and evenings, while taking Wednesday off.

Other days, players worked performing running drills, conditioning and learning new techniques from assistant coach Mike Miller, as coaches are only allowed to spend two hours a week with a player.

Junior Travis Reynolds said he believes the training will pay off when the season starts.

"Everybody is working hard to improve on the court and in the weight room," Reynolds said. "We are much stronger this year."

Last season was a difficult one for the Cats, he said. The team finished last in the Big 12 Conference, and the resignation of head coach Tom Asbury left players with a bit of a bad taste in their mouths.

"We have a lot of guys who don't want to finish like that again," Reynolds said.

For Reynolds and the rest of the team, practice starts Saturday inside a refurbished Bramlage Coliseum.

The team will be playing under a new scoreboard and running on a new court, looking to grow together.

The names fall line by line on the roster of the returners: Quentin Buchanan, Galen Morrison, Reynolds and Donnie Wallace, to name a few.

Factor in Wooldridge's first recruiting class of Terry Atchison, Larry Reid, Matt Seibrandt and Richie Terry, and this team is collectively the foundation of the future. And it's an optimistic future, Reynolds said, not just because the team is working out in the off-season, but because of the coaches' style.

"This year, the coaching staff is teaching us a lot more skills," Reynolds said. "They are teaching us a lot of stuff we didn't know, so that is going to make us that much better."

Wallace said he agreed, and said the off-season work has been beneficial.

"Yeah, I think it is," he said. "This time last year we weren't doing nearly as much. We are learning a lot more this year."

The players joining the Cat veterans come in with something to prove of their own. Larry Reid, a transfer from Northern Oklahoma Community College, who remains on the team after an off-season altercation with a Parking Services official, said he has a wide range of goals for the Cats' ensuing season.

"My goals, personally, are to win and help the team do well," he said. "Coming in, and playing in this new league — it is all the beginning."

It is simpler for Wallace, who said the program, which finished at the bottom, has only one direction it can go.

"Of course we are going to try and improve. When you finish in last place, there is really nowhere to go but up," Wallace said.

With practice starting tomorrow, Reynolds said the Cats are eager to tip off the 2000-01 season.

"We are trying to get the ground breaking this year," he said, "and just go out and do the best that we can."

Team aims for 2nd half of cross country season

By JASON ARY
Kansas State Collegian

It's midway through the cross country season, and things are about to get hectic.

The Wildcats, in preparation for the Pre-NCAA Invitational this weekend in Ames, Iowa, are gearing up for an intense season finale as they prepare for three main championships in the next five weeks.

This weekend in Ames, both the women's and men's cross country teams will go up against some of the best teams in the nation. On the women's side, the fifth-ranked Wildcats will be competing against numerous other powerhouses, including 17 of the top 25 teams in the country, as well as nine of the top-10 teams in the nation.

The women's team, which took fifth place at the Pre-NCAA's last year, will face a tougher task this time around, as the course has been extended from 5,000 meters to 6,000 meters. The decision was made prior to the season to increase the women's course in the Pre-NCAA and all three NCAA Championship meets as well.

The men's team will face some tough adversaries this weekend, battling against 10 of the top 25 teams, including Stanford, Arkansas and Colorado, ranked one, two and three, respectively. While the length of the course has not been extended for the men's competition, they have to face a much longer course than the women, duking it out over a course measuring 10,000 meters, equivalent to about 6 1/2 miles.

The meet, which is considered as preparation for the three upcoming championship meets, is often considered by many to actually be a fourth championship event. Featuring more than 65 teams from across the nation, many believe it to be just as important as the NCAA Championships.

After the conclusion of the Pre-NCAA, the Wildcats will have two weeks to work out any kinks before traveling to Boulder, Colo., to compete in the Big 12 Championships. Then, on Nov. 11, they will head back to Iowa to participate in the NCAA Midwest Regionals, in Waterloo. Finally to wrap up the season, the Wildcats will return to Ames to participate in the NCAA Championships, the last meet of the season.

For the women's team, the return of three All-Americans in Amy Mortimer, Korene Hinds and Annie Wetterhus will give them experience as the women are once again headed up by head coach Randy Cole.

Preparation begins for A&M

■ Volleyball team works to preserve this season's perfect at-home record.

By SAM STIERS
Kansas State Collegian

K-State's women's volleyball team hasn't lost a game at home all year.

The Cats (12-4, 6-2) will try to continue that streak against No. 22 Texas A&M (11-4, 6-2) at 7 p.m. Saturday in Ahearn Field House.

The Cats will face a tough A&M squad that is coming off an impressive performance against Texas Tech in College Station. The Aggies are unbeaten at home this year but have struggled on the road, posting a 2-3 record in hostile environments.

K-State swept Colorado at home Wednesday but had trouble putting the Buffaloes away. Head coach Jim McLaughlin said that is something K-State can't afford to do against a tough Aggie team.

"A&M just has good systems," he said. "I think they're well coached, they don't make many errors. I don't want to get behind against them. It's going to be a good match. They're a quality team and so are we — it'll be a dogfight."

The Cats are using the time between matches to heal some injuries, especially to sophomore Jenny Pollard and juniors Lisa Mimick and Liz Wegner.

"We need a little bit of rest," McLaughlin said. "We need to get in a rhythm, we need to get healthy. We're banged up. Polly is probably at 70 percent. Mimick is coming back, so that is encouraging, Liz looks good, but we're going to go light tomorrow, that's for sure."

Wegner has been a dominating force on the court for the Cats all year. She has set the school record for kills in a three-game match three times this year and leads the Big 12 Conference in kills per game. She also is on pace to set the school record for a single season.

Despite her commanding performances this season, Wegner said she has a long way to go and so does the team, if they are going to fight their way back into the top 25.

"I think it's mental, just staying focused," she said. "We just need to do the little things, like talking on a ball and getting it up. I think we're getting better at that slowly. In practice, we're going to get focused on A&M. They're top 25, so we've got to beat them."

The Cats are hitting .262 as a team, and junior setter Disney Bronnenberg said the team needs to step up on offense if they are going to win against the Aggies.

"I think a lot of our transition we need to work on," she said. "I think we need to work on our offense. There is always a lot we have to work on."

SPORTS BRIEFS

Wildcat netters travel to ITA Riviera tourney

Petra Sedlmajerova, Alena Jecminkova, Kathy Chuda and Eva Novotna' will represent K-State when they travel to California for the Intercollegiate Tennis Association Riviera Women's All-American Championships in Pacific Palisades, Saturday through Oct. 22.

The tournament draw features returning NCAA All-Americans and at least one player from each of the ITA regions. The remaining players come from the qualifying rounds.

"This is a very strong show," head coach Steve Bietau said. "This is a tournament that all the players look forward to playing because of the great competition."

Action begins with prequalifying, Saturday and Sunday, and qualifying, Oct. 17-18. The tournament's main draw starts Oct. 19 and continues through Oct. 22.

In singles play, Novotna' and Chuda are entered in the prequalifying, while Jecminkova is in the qualifying rounds.

Sedlmajerova, the highest-ranked returnee from the Central Region, earned the region's entry in the main draw.

Doubles action features Sedlmajerova/Novotna' in the qualifying doubles rounds, while the duo of Chuda/Jecminkova are entered in prequalifying.

K-State, Oklahoma to protect their logos

Hours before kickoff of the K-State/Oklahoma game in Manhattan this weekend, representatives from The Collegiate Licensing Co. and local law enforcement will canvas the Manhattan marketplace in search of counterfeit K-State and Oklahoma merchandise.

Counterfeit merchandise is any product bearing the logos and trademarks of K-State and Oklahoma that has not been approved for sale by the universities.

Anyone suspecting counterfeit merchandise should call the CLC at (770) 956-0520 or the K-State Licensing Office at 532-6269 to report the suspected infringement.

Men's rowing team to christen boat today

The K-State Rowing Association will christen a boat at 12:30 p.m. today in the Union Courtyard, honoring one of the club's top coaches in history, Don Rose, who started the men's rowing program in 1963.

K-State hall of famer to autograph book

Gary Spani, former K-State middle linebacker and K-State Sports Hall of Fame inductee, will be on hand for a book-signing session today from noon to 1 p.m. at the K-State Union Bookstore.

Spani, who played football at Manhattan High School, as well as for 10 years in the pros, will autograph the book "Wildcats to Powercats," written by Mark Stallard.

The book contains K-State football facts and trivia and is available at the bookstore for $12.95.

During his career at K-State (1974-77), Spani averaged more than 12 tackles per game and was an All-Big Eight performer. He was the Cats' first consensus All-American his senior season.

Club's recycling efforts continue

By DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

A banner bearing the words "Take Your Top Off and Recycle" tells the story.

Members of the Students for Environmental Action set up Thursday afternoon east of Seaton Hall to un-cap more than 160 square feet of plastic bottles.

Their purpose was to promote recycling and make a difference at K-State, said Diana Sjogren, SEA public relations chair and senior in international marketing.

"We're trying to raise the environmental awareness in general," Sjogren said. "We feel there are people that don't know how to recycle and don't know they are supposed to take the tops off."

SEA did their part in collecting hundreds of bottles after each of K-State's three home football games at KSU Stadium, exhibiting the large amount of waste that has easy potential for recycling.

Those bottles were bagged and placed in an 8-foot by 20-foot trailer provided by Howie's Recycling Inc. and were brought to K-State Wednesday in hopes of proving a point. That aim was to show the university it needed to start acting in an environmentally conserved manner, said Ben Champion, SEA president and senior in chemistry.

"I'm a big fan of the environment. It sustains us as a population, so I don't see any reason why we shouldn't sustain it," he said. "K-State, in a lot of ways, is really backwards in environmentalism."

Aside from uncapping bottles Thursday, SEA members urged students to sign a petition proposing the development of a recycling budget at K-State.

The petition specified that a fee of $2 per student per semester, would be allocated toward the creation of that budget, as funds would be under the direction of the Division of Facilities. Monies would provide for the division's growing management and labor needs, as well as the purchase and maintenance of recycling containers on campus.

Champion said SEA is planning to propose the signed petition to the Student Governing Association at some point this semester.

"It matters how long it takes to get signatures, but we're working steadily," he said. "We don't plan on stopping until something develops."

That attitude has been the driving force behind SEA since its origination last spring, Champion said.

On Feb. 17, SEA was created, based on a former organization known as Students Helping the Environment.

Now recognized by K-State, Champion said SEA's mission, as discussed collectively by members, is to remain committed to ensuring a healthy natural environment and conserving the ecological community of K-State, the city of Manhattan and surrounding regions.

Champion said SEA believes they will accomplish that goal by educating about local and global environmental issues, inspiring an environmentally friendly ethic and worldview and promoting grassroots activism to find solutions to protect the planet.

SEA's urgency to meet those goals stems from the fact that K-State doesn't have a recycling budget. Currently, all funding for recycling is taken from the custodial budget.

Sjogren said the organization is also pushing for K-State to hire and pay an individual to work as an environmental coordinator.

"Right now, any recycling that is done is done by facilities, and basically, they're doing the recycling as a favor," Sjogren said.

So, since its origination, SEA has worked hand-in-hand with John Woods, director of University Physical Facilities.

"He helped get clusters going before we existed," Sjogren said. "We're always working real closely with him."

Those recycling clusters seen across K-State's campus were funded by a $64,000 grant from the city of Manhattan in 1998, and the city agreed to give K-State $23,000 per year for the next three years after that.

Plus, Woods said Manhattan will give an additional $25,000 next year to purchase a truck and a forklift.

However, that means funding for 2002 is in question.

Thus, SEA's goal is to gain a dependable student-funded K-State recycling program in the next year and a half.

"We know the students will be here," Champion said, "so if they're willing to pay $2 per semester then we'll have a permanent budget that will be there year after year."

But with the importance of money, so is the emphasis on participation.

Sjogren encourages any and all individuals interested in the protecting the environment and helping it remain stable to join SEA, as the volunteer group consists of only about 13 base members.

"The purpose of SEA is protect the environment and raise its awareness," she said. "We're basically planning for the future. The time to act is now."

And Woods is pleased to see that kind of student support for environmentalism.

"I'm excited with the students," he said. "The SEA program has really helped. That's what we need is more people involved."

Amy Ryser, junior in agronomy, removes caps from plastic bottles Thursday afternoon in front of Seaton Hall so they can be recycled. Ryser worked with Students for Environmental Action, which had collected the bottles in the parking lot of KSU Stadium after three football games.

MORE INFO?

SEA is meeting at 8 a.m. Sunday at KSU Stadium to collect bottles left from the K-State/Oklahoma football game. All are welcome to attend.

In addition, students who missed signing SEA's petition can do so during any of its meetings, which are at 9 p.m. Thursdays in the Union Council Chambers on the second floor of the K-State Student Union.

Workshop offers help in preparing for career

By MICHELLE BERTUGLIA
Kansas State Collegian

This is the story of seven strangers, picked to live in a loft and have their lives taped.

The "Real World, Life after K-State," is not an MTV show, but rather a workshop sponsored by Career and Employment Services and the College of Arts and Sciences. It will take place from 5:30 p.m. to 8:30 p.m. Monday on the second floor of the K-State Student Union.

The workshop will focus on teaching students the skills they need to pick up while at K-State to ready themselves for the job market, graduate and professional schools, said Tim Henderson, assistant director of Career and Employment Services.

Henderson said there will be five free sessions throughout the evening and students can choose to attend three out the five. The workshops will range from interview-based to panel discussions, resume tips, how to prepare for graduate school and a presentation on the importance of internships.

Henderson said all are welcome to come and emphasized the importance of the workshop for underclassmen.

"The workshop focuses on early awareness opportunities and gives students time to develop social skills early," he said.

Last spring, Henderson said he identified a need for a program like this and enlisted the help of the Arts and Sciences Ambassadors.

April Spence, Arts and Sciences Ambassador and senior in chemistry, said the night will be good for underclassmen because they will hear early-on and first hand what they need to do in college to find employment after college.

"Freshmen and sophomores may not realize what is out there for them," Spence said. "I wish there would have been a program like that when I was a freshman."

One of the employers presenting at the workshop, K-State alumnae Heather Meridith, product developer and senior chemist at Abbot Laboratories, said she too would have benefited from a workshop like this as an underclassmen.

"I wish someone would of put the seeds into my head early on that to get a job you have to have an awesome resume," Meridith said.

Meridith will be presenting valuable tips on how to interview, in the interview workshop. She said she will discuss how to go through different structures of interviews, give examples of common questions asked at interviews, help them to prepare for problem questions and will do some role playing.

She said it is important for students to realize that they will have to answer in their first interviews to what they have been doing for the past four years.

Henderson said the whole night will be geared toward early exposure of what the real world will expect from graduates.

"It will be a relaxed atmosphere for students to learn a lot and network with top notch employers, graduate and professional schools," Henderson said.

Israelis attack Palestinian leader's compound, other high-profile targets; actions dim hope for truce talks

By IBRAHIM HAZBOUN
The Associated Press

GAZA CITY, Gaza Strip — In a day of incendiary violence that left Mideast peacemaking in ashes, Israeli helicopters rocketed Palestinian leader Yassir Arafat's compound Thursday in retaliation for the mutilation of three Israeli soldiers by a mob of enraged Palestinians.

The day began with U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan and CIA chief George Tenet trying to broker a truce to end two weeks of daily fighting. But it degenerated swiftly, with both sides unleashing pent-up rage.

The Palestinians inflicted the worst losses yet on Israeli troops, while Israel's combat helicopters staged unprecedented attacks on high-profile Palestinian targets and tanks rumbled to the outskirts of Palestinian cities.

One Israeli rocket struck 150 feet from Arafat's seaside residential headquarters, with the Palestinian leader inside at the time, his aides said.

"This is a declaration of war — a crazy war," said Saeb Erekat, a senior Palestinian official.

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak said Arafat does not appear to be a partner for peace at this time. Barak said he held Arafat's government indirectly responsible for the killing of the soldiers.

Barak also renewed calls to the hawkish opposition party Likud to join an emergency coalition. Likud has rebuffed Barak in the past, saying it would join only if he abandoned the peace talks. However, opposition leader Ariel Sharon — whose visit to a contested Jerusalem shrine two weeks ago triggered the violence — was to meet with Barak later Thursday.

Thursday's turmoil appeared to extinguish hopes that Israel and the Palestinians could soon negotiate a truce and bring an end to 15 days of bloodshed that have left at least 95 people dead, the vast majority Palestinians.

The attack on Arafat's compound and other key Palestinian targets was the first large-scale Israeli assault on important Palestinian sites since Arafat returned to the region in 1994 and the two sides launched negotiations aimed at a comprehensive settlement.

The violence had been waning this week, but erupted anew when Israeli reservist soldiers made a wrong turn and ended up near the center of the West Bank town of Ramallah, a flashpoint of fighting between Israeli troops and Palestinian rioters.

The soldiers, traveling in a civilian car, were chased by Palestinians and sought shelter in the Ramallah police station. Word of their presence spread, and more than 1,000 Palestinians surged toward the building.

Palestinian forces tried to keep the mob at bay, but about 10 men broke through a second-floor window where the Israelis were held. The attackers soon emerged with blood-covered hands as the crowd roared with approval.

Thursday's turmoil appeared to extinguish hopes that Israel and the Palestinians could soon negotiate a truce and bring an end to 15 days of bloodshed that have left at least 95 people dead, the vast majority Palestinians

The body of one Israeli soldier was thrown into the street, and a second was dangled down by a rope, where the corpse was stomped and beaten with iron bars. From the window, Palestinians shook their fists and flashed gleeful "V for victory" signs. Both bodies were soaked in blood.

Israel initially said two soldiers were killed, but Barak later told CNN that three soldiers died.

"The brutal lynching in Ramallah is a very grave incident," said Israel's acting foreign minister, Shlomo Ben-Ami. "More than just escalating the explosive situation, the event shows a lack of respect for human life."

Israel's army said the helicopter strikes were a "limited action designed to respond to the barbaric act Palestinians conducted this morning." Deputy Defense Minister Ephraim Sneh said Israel did not intend to "conquer" territory in the West Bank and Gaza Strip under Palestinian security control.

Still, the assault showed Israel was prepared to use heavy weaponry the Palestinians do not possess.

The Israeli forces first targeted the police station and the Palestinian TV headquarters in Ramallah. Black columns of smoke rose from the city, and at least 12 people were injured, the Palestinians said.

In Gaza City, Arafat's headquarters and buildings near it were hurriedly evacuated. Shortly afterward, a guard house next to the residence was hit, and smoke rose above the compound. Residents sprinted from nearby buildings.

Barak said Arafat himself never was a target in the helicopter attacks.

Israel's attack came shortly after Arafat met with Tenet at an undisclosed location in Gaza City. Tenet left before the attacks began.

In Ramallah, the Palestinian police station was reduced to rubble after being hammered by the rockets, and flames poured out of a second building. An angry mob gathered outside the station, shouting "God is great," and raising a Palestinian flag on a damaged wall.

After nightfall, Israeli helicopter gunships attacked the main compound of the Palestinian security forces in the West Bank town of Nablus. Police officers fled into the street before the shooting began. In the West Bank town of Jericho, dozens of Palestinians set ablaze an ancient synagogue.

Musical greats to perform blues concert in Salina

ABOVE: "Sometimes I just go up there on the stage, and just play, all alone, just play," APO recording artist Jimmy D. Lane said about the stage at Blue Heaven Studios in Salina, Kan., a retired sanctuary at a Methodist church. Lane and his band will perform with the musicians Friday and Saturday. They are the legends. They are the masters who created an electric sound. They are the architects who crafted music for generations to come.

And they perform live this weekend.

Seven blues musicians from the streets of Chicago to the swamps of Louisiana will take the stage at the third annual "Blues Masters at the Crossroads" at Blue Heaven Studios in Salina, Kan.

The stage is the sanctuary of a retired Methodist church. What once was the business of saving souls now is the business of saving authentic sounds of the blues.

"These are the blues legends," said Chad Kassem, a record producer at Blue Heaven Studios. "If you talk to anybody who knows about the blues, they'll tell you they are the originators. They are the real deal."

Lazy Lester, Pinetop Perkins and Weepin' Willie Robinson will perform songs that provided a foundation for musicians such as Eric Clapton and Jimi Hendrix.

Although many local people lack a complete understanding of the blues, Kassem said, they know they are guaranteed a good show. The sanctuary's acoustics provide ultimate sound quality.

"You get pure acoustics in the church with music played by the masters," Kassem said. "It's so pure."

The sanctuary/studio seats 400 people, providing for an intimate environment. According to Kassem, there is not a bad seat in the house. Everyone in the audience can see and hear.

"It's not like a regular concert," Kassem said. "The people really feel closely connected. There are people crying, it sounds so good."

Fellow record producer and professional blues guitarist Jimmy D. Lane has grown up with the blues — literally. His father, the legendary Jimmy Rogers, pioneered the electric sound of the blues in Chicago. Lane has recorded with artists such as Eric Clapton, Keith Richards, Mick Jagger and Stephen Stills.

"It's part of my blood," Lane said. "I'm very proud of the blues."

Lane said he considers himself fortunate to have played with the musicians that influenced him. He said while he was helping his father record his last album shortly before his death, Kassem, who was producing the record, approached him with the idea of recording blues musicians in a church in a small Kansas town.

Lane jumped at the chance to preserve the blues and to invest in good quality music. He said the thought of recording music absent of the greed and hunger for money of record labels he had worked with in the past was appealing.

"We just love what we're doing," Lane said. "We're not even thinking about money."

Lane and Kassem will be recording the concerts. People from across the country will be in attendance, with people flying in from coast to coast, even one coming from Holland. Lane said the thought of such a loyal attendance honors both he and Kassem in their efforts to document American history before it is gone.

"We're trying to capture as much of these blues cats as possible," Lane said. "They won't be here for long."

BirdHouse to feature satirical singer

By KRISTEN DYMACEK
Kansas State Collegian

It's normal to have political satires about Pinzac and guns interlwined with ballads about love and broken hearts.

At least it is in Cheryl Wheeler's performances.

Wheeler, who will be performing in the second BirdHouse Concert Series of the semester Friday evening, specializes in both writing and performing ballads and political satires, David Kamerer, BirdHouse co-founder, said.

"She is one of the most acclaimed songwriters we've ever presented," Kamerer said. "She's as good as modern songwriters get."

Wheeler has released several albums and has written songs used by big-name artists, including Garth Brooks, Suzy Bogguss and Bette Midler.

He said Wheeler, who accompanies herself on guitar and piano, usually saves her liberal satires for her live performances.

"Her live shows are full of stupid, hilarious songs that blow people away," he said. "She has a wickedly funny far left-wing standpoint."

Besides her political songs, she also performs a number of ballads.

"She has a profound sadness," he said. "She has poetic, beautiful melodies. They're very beautiful, sweet love songs. You kind of just have to hear them."

Some people already have had the opportunity to hear Wheeler. Gretchen Holden, BirdHouse board member, said Wheeler was a hit with the audience when she performed at BirdHouse a couple of years ago.

"She back by popular demand," Holden said. "It was a sellout last time. People were just thrilled."

She said Wheeler's popularity had a lot to do with her style of music.

"Her music just picks you right off your seat," she said. "I think people are hungry for this kind of music. You can't get this kind of music on the radio. You just can't."

Kamerer said even though Wheeler's combination of satires and ballads seems unusual, it works well for her.

"It doesn't sound like it works, but it really does," he said. "All of her songs have a strong, emotional core."

Wheeler won't be the only one performing on Friday. Tanya Savory will be opening for Wheeler.

"Tanya is Americana," Kamerer said. "She's the rural approach to country."

He said there shouldn't be any disappointment with this BirdHouse performance.

"Wheeler is an immensely gifted writer who happens to be very funny. All her intelligence shows in her songs," he said. "She will be remembered long after she is gone."

TICKET INFO
The performance is 8 p.m. Friday at the Manhattan Arts Center. Tickets are $10 for students and $12 for the general public and can be purchased at MAC or the Dusty Bookshelf in Aggieville.

Die Fledermaus
Tuesday, October 17, 7:30 p.m.
Join us as we raise the curtain on one of the most well loved operettas of all time, Johann Strauss's Die Fledermaus: a bubbly concoction of champagne, masquerades, amorous flirtations and practical jokes. Western Opera Theater has assembled some of the world's brightest young talents for this lively journey into the romance of Strauss's delightful melodies set in the intoxicating extravagance of late 19th century Vienna.
Pre-performance lecture by Dr. Reginald Pittman.

Student/Child $20,$18

Inti-Illimani
Friday, October 27, 8 p.m.
The seven members of this Chilean-based ensemble have enraptured audiences with their special blend of instrumentals and vocals for decades. Playing more than 30 wind, string, and percussion instruments, they have traveled the world weaving an extraordinary cultural tapestry and taking audiences on a tour through the love and pain of daily life. You won't want to miss the ensemble that's recorded more than 30 albums and performed for Amnesty International on stage with Bruce Springsteen, Mercedes Sosa, Sting, Wynton Marsalis and Peter Gabriel.
Public $20
Senior $18
Student/Child $10

The Second City
Friday, November 3,
7:00 p.m. & 9:30 p.m.
What do Julia Louis-Dreyfus, Chris Farley, Bonnie Hunt, Tim Meadows, Bill Murray, Jeremy Piven and George Wendt have in common? They're all alumni of a club that opened its doors in 1959: Chicago's Second City. The club's specialty, improv comedy, was brand new, and success was instantaneous, earning The Second City Time Magazine kudos as "a temple of satire." Now, maybe you can't take off for a night in Chicago. That's all right. For 30 years The Second City has taken its show on the road and this year it's coming to Manhattan. So get ready for a medley of classic scenes, songs and improvisations that are always original, daring and hilarious. Presented in Nichols Theater. Performances are for mature audiences.
Public $18
Senior $16

effort. He said this could decrease the student fee.

The 16,525-square-foot student activities center would be added to the Union's east side. Worcester said it would be completed by fall 2003.

An architect will not be hired for the project unless it is endorsed by the student body. Worcester said planning for the structure has not yet been finalized.

The three-floor structure has been projected to hold 120 cubicle spaces for campus organizations. There would also be office space for Greek Affairs, Union Program Council, Student Governing Association, multicultural student organizations and about four other organizations.

There would also be conference rooms, a secretarial staff, mailboxes, computer labs, storage space, workrooms and office equipment available in the center. Worcester said it would provide leadership resources for students.

"The student activities center is a concept — it's more than a physical structure," he said. "There are a lot of student organizations out there that don't have what they need to succeed."

The center would be a place for campus unity and diversity, Worcester said. He said new students would have increased opportunities to become involved on campus.

"I don't see a better way to do this than with the student activities center," he said.

Worcester said he would visit student organizations, residence halls and greek houses before the vote in November.

"We've got to educate students about what the student activities center is about," he said.

"I've always been told that I have the gift of a big mouth," McDaniel said. "I thought this would be a good way to put it to use."

McDaniel's spirit also carries into the football stadium on game days.

"Most generally, we are there at least two hours before the gates open," McDaniel said. "I'm always there in the front with either purple hair or a purple snakeskin hat."

College students were not the only loud football fans who participated. Joe Wesley, of Salina, Kan., came to show he was a K-State fan.

"We can't go through Manhattan and not stop at Chance for a beer," Wesley said. "We wanted to come up and rock before the game."

Cats to square off against familiar faces

By DEREK BOSS

It'll be a clash of the "old" and "new" Saturday at KSU Stadium, at least from a coaching perspective.

A quartet of former Wildcat assistants under head coach Bill Snyder will make their returns to Manhattan this weekend, this time clad in the crimson and white of Oklahoma.

"I told a couple guys the other day, it's almost like playing your brother," senior defensive end Monty Beisel said. "It's one of those games, where the coaching staff that brought me in here three years ago, has moved on and expanded their careers, and they're coming back to Manhattan and are going to play here on the other side of the turf."

And Snyder knows the opposition well.

OU head coach Bob Stoops, co-defensive coordinators Mike Stoops and Brent Venables, and offensive coordinator Mark Mangino will all be facing their former field general on the opposing sideline this weekend.

Bob Stoops was an assistant for seven seasons at K-State, from 1989 to 1995, serving as Snyder's defensive coordinator in his last five years, before taking over the defensive unit at the University of Florida.

However, Bob Stoops took an offer last season he couldn't refuse in taking over the head coaching job at Oklahoma. His only problem — hiring a new staff.

Bob Stoop's solution — he turned to the coaches he knew best, delving into Snyder's coaching pool at K-State.

He quickly hired his brother Mike, as well as Venables, to oversee the Sooner defensive schemes, while also persuading Mangino to head south to Norman, Okla.

Nevertheless, all this occurred while K-State was amid its 1998 postseason tragedy, falling to Texas A&M in the Big 12 Championship and ending the year with an 11-2 record after a disappointing Builders Square Alamo Bowl loss to Purdue.

Yet, Bob Stoops said his decision to pursue and hire the Wildcat assistants was justified.

"I think coaches have the right to deal with their lives, and their families and careers as they feel fit," Bob Stoops said Monday. "These are all coaches who've spent seven or eight years at K-State. And if that causes hard feelings, because they don't want to spend the rest of their lives there, then that's the way it goes."

When the smoke had cleared, Snyder's defensive staff was in question, and he found an answer in two former Sooners.

Snyder hired his current defensive coordinator Phil Bennett, as well as Rex Ryan, the two coaches who had helped then-OU head coach John Blake engineer a defensive turnaround in one short season.

And the changing of the guard was complete.

THE AFTERMATH

Although Bennett and Ryan swapped places with Mike Stoops and Venables, Snyder and the Cats' defensive staff was by no means set in stone.

Ryan, in a matter of months since his hiring, found his calling in the professional ranks, taking a job with the Baltimore Ravens and leaving Bennett to head the Wildcat defensive charge.

Now, after the tables have been turned in both Manhattan and Norman, the stage is set for Saturday afternoon.

But whether the opposing coaches facing their former teams creates an edge for either side remains to be seen, Snyder said.

"As I look at it, I don't know how much of an advantage or disadvantage that we might have in that respect. Their coaches have coached our defensive and offensive coaches," he said.

"They would have a pretty good understanding of what the capabilities of our

THE OL' SWITCHAROO

The 1999 season brought with it several changes, or rather place trading, in the coaching staffs of both K-State and Oklahoma. Here's a brief rundown.

BOB STOOPS, Oklahoma head coach

K-State assistant coach from 1989 to 1995.
K-State defensive coordinator from 1991 to 1995.
Stoops left K-State for the University of Florida in 1996 and took over at Oklahoma in 1999.

MIKE STOOPS
Oklahoma co-defensive coordinator

Former K-State assistant coach from 1992 to 1998. Stoops took over as the Cats' defensive coordinator when his brother, Bob, left for the University of Florida after the 1995 season. He went to Oklahoma in 1999 when Bob was named head coach.

BRENT VENABLES
Oklahoma co-defensive coordinator

Former K-State linebacker. Graduated in 1992 and became a graduate assistant coach. In 1996, Venables became a Cat linebackers coach and became the defensive run game coordinator in 1998. He joined the Oklahoma staff for the 1999 season.

MARK MANGINO
Oklahoma offensive coordinator

Mangino started his K-State career in 1991 as an offensive line coach. He spent 1997 as the running game coordinator and in 1998 became assistant head coach. He left for Oklahoma in 1999.

PHIL BENNETT
K-State defensive coordinator

Bennett was the Oklahoma assistant coach in 1998 before moving to K-State for the 1999 season.

QUICK FACTS

- K-State has won five consecutive games against the Sooners and three consecutive contests in Manhattan.
- During the Wildcats' current five-game winning streak against Oklahoma, Bill Snyder has been opposed by four different Oklahoma head coaches.
- Sooner quarterbacks coach Chuck Long played for Snyder at the University of Iowa. Snyder said Sooner QB Josh Heupel is reminiscent of Long.

"He was with us at the University of Iowa, as a tremendous quarterback and person as well. I think it's a great match – I see those things in Heupel as well," Snyder said.

"He has tremendous accuracy, great presence on the field, quality leadership and a great understanding of what their offense is. You can't ask for a whole lot more than that."

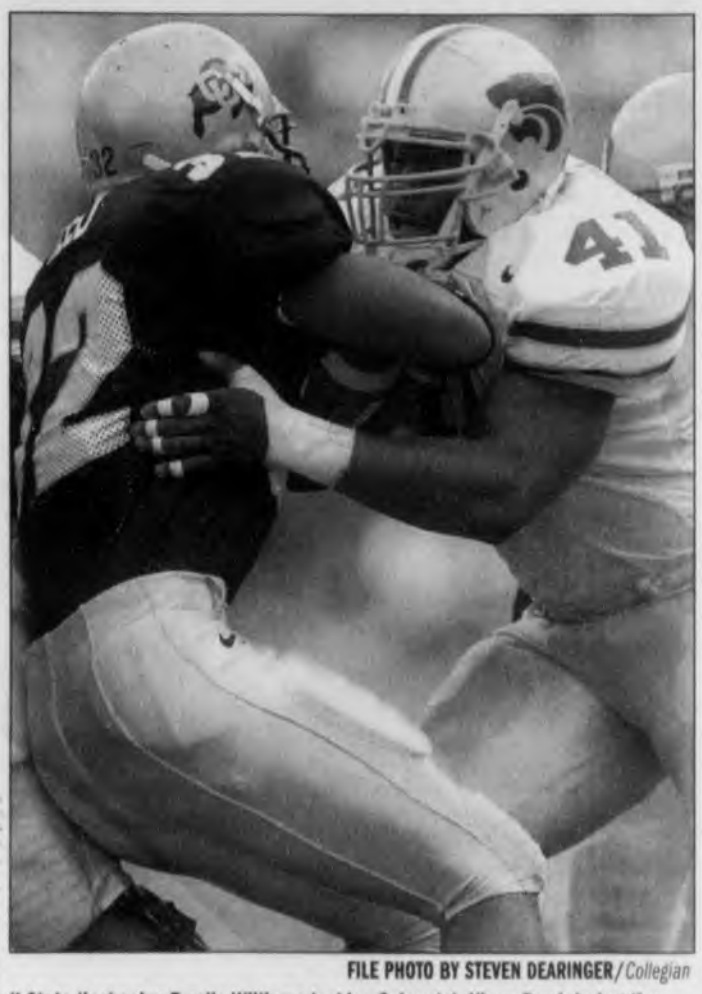
Wildcat injury update

- Tailback David Allen made his return debut last Saturday in K-State's 52-13 romp over Kansas.

Although the senior was only used in the backfield, compiling 19 yards on nine carries, head coach Bill Snyder said there is a very good likelihood Allen will be back returning punts against the Sooners.

"I've been waiting for this for five weeks now, I've been out for a while," Allen said. "I'm just real anxious to get out there and to contribute to help my team win, and do the things I was doing before I got injured and just play football again."



- Both senior left tackle Milford Stephenson (unspecified injury) and junior left guard Andy Eby, who left the Kansas game with an injury to his left arm that appeared to be a dislocated elbow, are probable for the OU contest.

"It appears at this time, (they) could be healthy to go," Snyder said. "Again, I'm not telling you that's exactly the way it's going to play out, but that's a possibility."

Something will have to give in Saturday's Big 12 showdown, when No. 8 Oklahoma meets No. 2 K-State at KSU Stadium in Manhattan.

Oklahoma, the second-best scoring team in the nation, comes into this weekend's battle averaging a scorching 490.4 yards per game, good for fourth in college football this season.

However, the Sooners will have to deal with a K-State scoring defense that ranks first in the country in giving up only 228.5 yards per contest, also tops among division one teams.

For K-State, it will be hard to overlook the 64-13 bombshell that OU dropped on then-No. 10 Texas last weekend in Dallas, a win charged with enough emotion to compel Oklahoma President David Boren to cancel classes the following Monday.

Led by senior quarterback Josh Heupel and sophomore receivers Andre Woolfolk and Antwone Savage, the Sooners racked up an impressive 534 yards against the Longhorns, their highest offensive output of the year. Oklahoma's handling of their rivals from Austin, elicited praise from K-State head coach Bill Snyder.

"It's a prolific-type offense," Snyder said of the potent OU attack. "I mean, there's an abundance of things that they are capable of doing, and regardless of who the personnel happens to be, it can be a very effective, very efficient offense. What we're learning is when you put a Josh Heupel with it and some very, very fine receivers and backs that it becomes even more prolific."

Oklahoma's blowout last weekend also gave the Sooners a chance to feature sophomore fullback Quentin Griffin, who leads the team in all-purpose yardage. Griffin ran for 87 yards on his way to six touchdowns, breaking the Oklahoma single-game touchdown record.

Snyder said OU's multi-pronged attack presents a different challenge to his team, and acknowledges that the Sooners' 6.7 average yards from scrimmage come from a number of wrinkles in the offense.

"It's an offense that can be a big-play offense," Snyder said. "But it's also one that can be a substitute for a running offense in which you can throw the shorter passes and pick up the kind of yardage that you might in a running game in order to move the chains. It has the capabilities of doing both."

However, K-State's defensive unit, under the direction of coordinator Phil Bennett, has been nearly inpenetratable in six contests this season.

The mission for Bennett and the opportunistic Wildcat defense will be to limit Heupel's chances of making the big play by putting pressure on him through different looks and schemes.

"You've got to mix it up, and you've got to disguise some things," Bennett said of his strategy toward the Oklahoma game. "You've got to give them different looks."

However, K-State has proven its defensive power, and Bennett said the base defense will not change significantly against the Sooners.

"I want to see us do the things that we can do," Bennett said of his defense, which has allowed just 10 points per game in 2000.

K-State linebackers Ben Leber, Turelle Williams and Jason Kazar will be charged with disrupting Heupel's concentration by executing Bennett's blitzing schemes and coverage drops.

"Watching him on film is kind of scary, he's got great touch and great vision," Leber said of Heupel's passing talent. "They really know how to make plays, and they don't look like they make a lot of mistakes. We can't have a mental lapse out there, or else they'll exploit us and go for six."

Another important element of the defensive attack will hinge on how well cornerbacks Dyshod Carter and Jerametrius Butler can clamp down on OU's top receivers.

"They have a great receiving corps with Woolfolk, and Savage and those guys," Carter said. "They do a lot of things, and they have a lot of great receivers. Everybody will have to lock on their man and stay focused."

And with an electric atmosphere surrounding the Stoops brothers return to Manhattan, Carter is counting on the fans to make the stadium loud enough to add another element to Heupel's performance in the game — confusion.

"Whenever you play at home, it's an advantage," the senior cornerback said. "Your fans are always going to have your back and be supportive of you, and we'll try to keep them in the game.

Record expected for 'Gameday'

By DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

While K-State will be busy attempting to break records on the football field against Oklahoma, Wildcat fans will try to shatter one of their own Saturday at KSU Stadium.

According to officials at ESPN, K-State Sports Information Director Doug Dull said the "unofficial" record for a "College Gameday" broadcast not immediately involving a game was formerly maintained by Wildcat faithful in 1998, when an estimated 10,000 fans came early for the broadcast prior to the K-State/Nebraska game.

"I think K-State fans show themselves well," President Jon Wefald said. "I remember talking to (ESPN's) Lee Corso on the phone in 1998, and he said they had never had that kind of a turnout — it was unprecedented."

However, Virginia Tech drew crowds of 12,000 and 15,000 for broadcasts in Blacksburg, Va., last season, giving Cat fans the incentive to regain the record, Dull said.

In turn, the gates at KSU Stadium will open at 8:30 a.m. Saturday, with seating available on the east side only.

Fans will need to be in the stadium by 9:20 a.m., when a live segment of ESPN "SportsCenter" will originate from Manhattan. The actual "College Gameday" show will run from 10 until 11 a.m.

"I think ESPN 'Gameday' has a real strong appeal," said Max Urick, director of the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics, "and I think fans will be eager to show up and give ESPN a warm welcome back to Manhattan."

The production crew also will tape a segment to be shown at halftime of ESPN's first games of the day, with all filming to be finished at 11:20 a.m.

Then, the stadium will be cleared of fans and will re-open at 12:30 p.m. for all game guests, with kickoff of the KSU/OU game set for 2:35 p.m.

However, regardless of the outcome of Saturday's game, Wefald said he won't be taking any rash actions, such as canceling classes like Oklahoma President David Boren did Monday, following the Sooners' 64-13 decimation of rival Texas.

"What we're here for is to get students the best education that they can get," Wefald said. "We've never given any consideration to canceling classes for a football or basketball sporting event."

MORE INFO

- "Gameday" guests must have a game ticket to enter the stadium for the broadcast. Tickets will be checked, but not be torn.
- K-State player parents and K-State student-athletes should report to the ticket trailer on the east side for ticket validation.
- "Gameday" broadcast begins at 9:20 a.m. with a "SportsCenter" segment, and ends with taping of a halftime segment at 11:20 a.m.
- KSU Stadium will be cleared of all "Gameday" broadcast guests at 11:50 a.m.
- Stadium gates will re-open at 12:30 a.m. for all game guests.

Publicity adds hype to matchup

■ Media frenzy sparks distractions for players off field, hinders focus.

By DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

If ESPN "College Gameday", ABC Sports and two top-10 football teams had erected less of an extended level of hype this Saturday, junior Ben Leber wouldn't be nearly as reclusive.

"When you go home, don't watch TV. Don't watch any of these news things, don't read the papers," Leber said. "All the hype's going to be there from kids in class and things around, but you've just got to seclude yourself and focus on football and school.

"For a week, it'll be all right. It's going to be tough, but for one week, if that's what you've gotta do, then that's what you've gotta do."

As a result, head coach Bill Snyder said the media frenzy surrounding this Saturday's matchup between No. 2/3 K-State (6-0, 2-0) and No. 8 Oklahoma (5-0, 2-0) has been an obvious topic of discussion this week.

"We have addressed that, and again, it relates to distractions, I think, more than anything else, and just how you go about your daily week," Snyder said. "Our youngsters are still students, and it's important for them to understand that, and be in class and be at study table, and focus on their studies. And then, when it's football time, just to focus on that.

"Sometimes, when the campus and the community is abuzz as it is, or probably is, or will be, then I would expect that becomes a little bit more difficult, so we've addressed that."

In fact, the matchup is drawing striking resemblances to the K-State game against Nebraska in 1998, as both ESPN "Gameday" and ABC Sports were a witness to the second-ranked Wildcats' 40-30 victory over the No. 11 Huskers.

"In '98, there were very similar circumstances with whatever that ESPN program is, being here, and just the hype, so to speak, that presents itself."

Yet, although Leber said he tries to seclude himself to the task at hand, no one, including Snyder, can escape the ambiance surrounding Saturday's game.

"I'm not totally oblivious to things that are said and written, although I try to stay as sheltered from it as I can," Snyder said. "But some of it's out there, and I'm sure that makes it seem, perhaps, a little bit different.

"But by and large, my focus is, and I've tried to keep everyone else's focus, on business at hand and the task at hand, just as we would any other week, knowing that we're playing the best football team that we've played up to this point in time and this year."

However, senior quarterback and Heisman trophy candidate Jonathan Beasley said this type of big game is what college football is all about.

"It's also early in the season, too, so both team's being able to climb in the polls like they have even adds more persona to the game, and makes it more exciting to watch and to play in," he said.

Yet, fifth-year senior Chris Claybon said he acknowledges the need to maintain poise and not let the hype affect a team's performance on the playing field.

"I think we're going to be level-headed," he said, "but I'm sure some guys are going to have that little extra burst of energy, 'cause we are going to be a nationally televised game against a top-10 opponent."

That publicity gives the Cats yet another chance to make a national statement, especially considering K-State has only beaten a top-10 opponent once in school history, a 41-7 victory over then-No. 6 Kansas in 1995.

"I know it's going to be a little hostile," Beasley said. "Oklahoma's going to come in here with high hopes, and it's going to be a hard-fought ball game. I know the nation's looking at it as a challenge for us."

However, K-State will be blessed with the privilege of home field advantage Saturday, an invaluable asset compared to a game in Norman, Okla.

"Obviously, we've won a lot of games here," Phil Bennett, offensive coordinator, said. "We've got tremendous fans, and we've got great support, and that's a big deal for us.

"Of course, fans don't make tackles and they don't cover, but I think when you're in a familiar environment, you tend to be able to be a little more comfortable."

Being comfortable is a necessity when facing such a phenomenal quarterback in Josh Heupel, Leber said.

"Watching him on film is pretty scary. You can have great coverage on him, and he'll put the ball exactly where it needs to be, and the receivers are going to make the catches," he said. "So it's kind of scary. He's got great touch and great vision. It's going to be tough to contain him."

K-State offense geared up for Oklahoma

■ Recent win over Texas not indicative of Sooners offensive strength, ability.

By MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

After Oklahoma's 63-14 shellacking of Texas on Saturday, it might appear that K-State's offense will have to be in high gear to outscore the Sooners.

Fans shouldn't expect a shoot-out, however, since the Cats plan on making sure they're the only ones putting up the big offensive numbers, wide-out Quincy Morgan said.

"We have an exceptional defense. I'm not really worried about anybody putting up 63 points on us. That's just being truthful. OU knows that," he said.

Not that Oklahoma doesn't have a good defense of their own, K-State just has a highly potent offense, Morgan said.

"By far, it's the toughest defense we've seen this year. We have a much more experienced offense than Texas has," he said. "We have a good working offense, and we have a lot of athletes on our offense, so we feel like we can go out and score points on anybody."

Running back Josh Scobey said he agreed that the offense just has to play to its proven ability.

"We need to go out and work our offense, like we have to work it, and our defense will come to play," Scobey said. "We feel like we have to do whatever it takes to win, whether it be scoring 20 points or 50 points. We have to go out and work our offense like we've been doing these past couple weeks."

Making the job easier for the offense is the full-fledged return of running back David Allen to the backfield. Allen did play against Kansas on Saturday, but only carried the ball nine times for 19 yards. Those statistics certainly won't impress many people, but Allen said he isn't worried.

"I didn't run spectacular. Nine for 20 isn't great, but that wasn't my main goal," Allen said. "I just wanted to go out there and see how my ankle would hold up, see what it would feel like cutting on it, if somebody tackled me and fell on it, and I did that."

Allen's low rushing average was also typical of the entire rushing game against Kansas, running back Chris Claybon said.

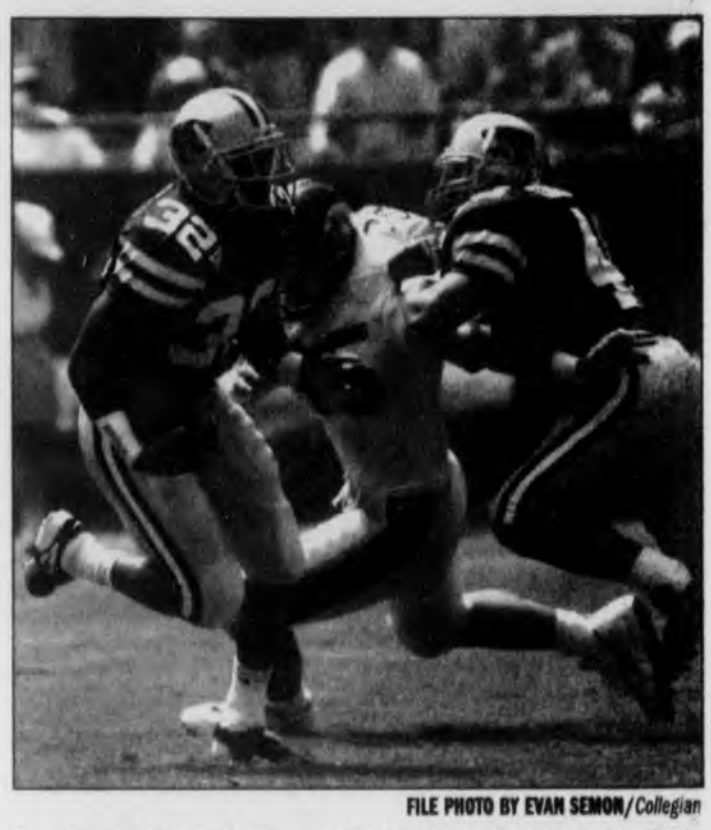
"Nobody ran the ball that effective against KU, so I can't say that it was him," Claybon said. "I think maybe we weren't as assignment sound and executed, as well as we'd liked to."

The Cats will be assignment sound against Oklahoma, offensive lineman Thomas Barnett said, even though the Sooners are ranked No. 15 in the nation in rushing defense, holding opponents to 93.2 yards per game.

"We're quite confident that we'll be able to run block on any defense," Barnett said. "We've been preparing week-in and week-out, and we should be pretty successful in our offense."

That success also will be helped by the return of Allen, who adds a degree of poise to the offensive attack, wide-out Aaron Lockett said.

"It gives us emotional stability. He's been here for five years, he knows what to expect," Lockett said. "Things don't rattle him, he knows what's going on. The fact that he's made plays for us time and time again, and if he can continue to do that, it will definitely help our offense."



The senior also gives the Cats a different look at tailback. The combination of Allen and the rest of the K-State running backs is dangerous, Scobey said.

"He's very complimentary. He can mix the defense up, I can mix the defense up," Scobey said. "It's just always good to have a back there with you, who can mix things up and get the defense on its toes."

Allen, on the other hand, said he just wants to make sure he doesn't slow down an already efficient offense.

"I just need to go out there and continue doing the things I was doing before — not hold the team back, not slack off from what we've done so far," Allen said.

"I just want to step in and keep the ball rolling."

Snyder responsible for success of OU

DEREK BOSS

Call it the teacher vs. the student or the master facing the protege. Call it what you will.

But such will be the case when K-State head coach Bill Snyder meets Oklahoma's Bob Stoops this Saturday.

And Snyder will get the best of him — no questions asked.

Granted, young Bobby has put together a decent OU team in only his second year as head coach, but he can thank Snyder for that.

Stoops, a five-year defensive coordinator and seven-year assistant to Snyder, learned how to run a ball club the right way — from the ground up. He picked up the do's and don'ts, the rights and wrongs, all the intangibles that helped make K-State the greatest turnaround in college football history.

It's like salt, brother.

If Bobby had any inkling of coaching talent and even paid the slightest bit of attention to Snyder in his years at K-State, the Sooners would've improved.

And it's obvious he paid attention, as OU is undefeated and sits as the No. 8 team in the nation.

But that can be expected since Stoops is working with three other former Wildcat assistants on his staff. Brother Mike Stoops and Brent Venables, two of K-State's top defensive coaches, left Manhattan to join Bobby, as did offensive specialist Mark Mangino.

So "traitor" Bobby, united with the other three "traitors" of the Wildcat program, literally should be expected to succeed. And if that's not enough, Snyder even molded OU quarterbacks coach Chuck Long, who was a QB at the University of Iowa under the current Cat legend.

Now, Long is molding a quarterback of his own in Norman. His name? Josh Heupel. Hmm, the irony just seems to jump out and bite ya, doesn't it?

How often does a coach like Bobby get to hand-pick his staff and succeed at another program's expense?

Everything Bob Stoops has earned over these past two seasons, including a combined 12-5 record and the Sooners' first bowl appearance since 1994, has been spoon-fed to him from Snyder's magical bowl of success.

Essentially, K-State's head coach is rebuilding Oklahoma's football program. It's sad to say, but true. Yet Stoops is the one deserving the mockery. For Snyder, it's an underlying compliment, just another facet elevating him among the elite collegiate football coaches of all time.

Now, I'm by no means underplaying Saturday's ball game. Regardless of the linguistics, the No. 2/3 Wildcats and the No. 8 Sooners are going to make one heck of a game.

In fact, it's kind of nice, too nice, to be able to call it a "game" this year. Prior to Snyder's arrival in 1989, OU simply owned the Wildcats, hinting to their all-time series lead of 63-16-4. K-State used to see red for weeks, after the explosive Sooners racked up 60 or 70 points on the Cats year-in and year-out.

But recently, it's been a complete turn of events. K-State has won five straight against OU by an average score of 35 to 16, as the Sooners are beginning to look at the Cats as a measuring stick. Snyder said that fact says things about both programs.

"I would take that as a compliment in reference to whatever has happened here in the past decade," Snyder said Tuesday. "I think in reference to their program, I perceive it as they are rapidly approaching the Oklahoma of old in the ability to be successful."

But unfortunately for Oklahoma, the Wildcats of new will dominate the Sooners of old.

No questions asked.

Sooners return to winning tradition

RYAN CHITTUM

The '90s were kind to K-State. Your program finally came to life after a century of ineptitude. It seems like only yesterday that I was listening to the radio as my Sooners rolled up 829 yards of total offense against the Mildcats.

That's right — 829 yards, 768 of which were on the ground. That OU win was in the midst of an unfortunate streak, in which you played 30 games and won none of them.

But the past is the past. We'll forget about all that. Your coach/slavedriver Bill Snyder's Manhattan Project has worked miracles with your formerly woeful program. Of course, his "football is life" mentality sends assistant coaches scrambling from Manhattan in droves.

Or it could be the fact that living in a place known as "The Little Apple" is just not conducive to anything besides crippling boredom. I don't know.

We gladly accepted damn-near half of your coaching staff when they applied for asylum here in Norman. They could not wait to get out of Manhattan and away from K-State, a program that will flame out in a few years, leaving nothing but a historical burp as it slides back into inferiority.

As for OU, we decided to let our football team slide for a few years so we could empathize with what programs like yours have gone through for so long. We at OU have concluded we don't like that losing stuff very much, and we are through with it.

So, you are welcome to start losing again — and you will, beginning this Saturday. Fear the Sooners, people, for we are back in a big way.

But whatever you do, please don't roll over and play dead like the Texas Longhorns did last Saturday. We like the thrill of good, heated competition. Oh, and speaking of: How about expanding your stadium? What does it hold now — 48,000 people? I would like to have been able to go to the game, but I guess I'll have to wait until you can find the funds to get a decent stadium.

Besides, what would I do in Manhattan, Kan.? I would have to come into your town right at game time and speed away after the gun sounds on OU's decisive victory.

I hope you are preparing for the Sooners' offense, because you can't stop it. I predict Josh Heupel will have 300 yards passing, Quentin Griffin will have three touchdowns, and J.T. Thatcher will run a punt back and get a pick.

Now, what else can I say about K-State? It's so much easier to talk about our long-hated rivals: Texas. We hate Texas. We don't hate you.

You just don't have the tradition, and there have been so few good games between our two schools that you are eminently unhateable.

Hopefully, Snyder can keep your football team going, and we can create a real rivalry. I think he can, but what will happen when he is gone? I am afraid your next coach won't be able to sustain his winning ways.

Oh yeah, you always should be able to win at least three or four games a year with your god-awful schedules. Please, take it easy on Ball State next time, will you?

We can make you honorary Sooner fans when the Wildcats return to losing. You can bet on it, our football team is good and brimming with confidence right now.

Anything can happen in a game between two top-10 teams, but don't expect OU to have a post-Texas let down. The Sooners will be fired up — ready to end your unacceptable five-game win streak against us.

Ryan is a senior in history and journalism.

COACHES

players were at that point in time, but those capabilities sometimes change. So, they could be very accurate in some respects, and not so accurate in others."

Yet, Snyder didn't go as far as to say the Sooner's run an equivalent version of K-State's defense in 1998.

"There are a lot of similarities, but there are also an ample number of things that they do, that are different than things that we have done in the past," Snyder said.

"They are a little bit more of a zone team than what we were, when those coaches were here in our program."

As far as if any chapters of Snyder's playbook are evident in Oklahoma, Snyder was skeptic.

"It is a separate style of offense with a different philosophy and structure," he said. "I see very few similarities."

In fact, fifth-year senior tailback Chris Claybon said all the opposing coaches' tendencies toward each other aren't as prevalent, as the media might perceive.

"From what we've been told, they run similar schemes," he said, "but I can't say there's that many similarities, as many as people would like there to be."

THE RESULT

So, will it be the old or the new that will prevail this weekend?

Claybon said it all will be decided on the field, despite the noticeable similarities among the coaching ranks that have settled near the surface off the field.

"They're going to know some things we like to do, we're going to know some things they like to do," Claybon said. "You take tendencies and everything with you, wherever you go. So it's going to be pretty much a wash-out.

"It's going to come down to who plays the best football on Saturday. It's not going to come down to anything in the past, any people from Oklahoma, any people from Kansas State. It's going to come down to who plays the best football."

Similar attitudes can be found across state lines, as well, as Bob Stoops said the opposing coaching staff's knowledge of each other won't be the deciding factor in the ball game.

"I don't know if there's a big advantage either way," he said, "but being around each other for, like I said, many years with Coach (Snyder), I think we all know a little bit about each other's strategy, and what we like to stop and what we like to go to.

"So you have a little bit of a feelings, but in the end, it will be the players on the field that make the difference."

Those Sooner players comprise a team ranked eighth in the nation with an undefeated 5-0 record, including 2-0 in the Big 12.

Yet, Snyder isn't at all surprised at Bob Stoops' quick success in his two years at the helm of the Oklahoma program. In fact, he said he expected it.

"There wasn't any reason not to," Snyder said. "I know that regardless of what the personnel was at the time, and I'm confident that they have quality, quality players — that's a good coaching staff.

"Those are good coaches, and I was pretty confident that they would get that program where it needed to be, and where they wanted it."

Although Snyder's positive comments toward the Bob Stoops' program at OU are quite typical of the Cat coach, similar praise won't be found on the opposing sideline this weekend.

For instance, in a Sports Illustrated article about the Stoops family coaching tree over the summer, Mike Stoops criticized Snyder publicly, saying in part: "I don't know if anybody ever leaves Coach Snyder on good terms. He simply doesn't accept that you would leave. But then again, there's no having a personal relationship with him, even when you're there."

Aside from verbal bashing, hints that one of the Sooner assistants told Iowa State coaches information concerning Wildcat audibles also arose last year, and that the Cyclones, in turn, used that information to jump out to an early 28-7 lead. Then, after Snyder and the Cats changed audibles, K-State rallied in the second half and won.

And on Saturday, the tensions will rise, too.

THE EMOTION

However, despite the recent rise in the OU program, as well as the certain level of controversy created, the veteran Wildcats on this year's squad don't hold any resentment at their former "teachers," who left Manhattan for the Red River of Oklahoma.

"I don't hold any grudges to any of the coaches," said senior Turelle Williams, who was recruited to K-State by the Stoops brothers. "If they felt as though they needed a different environment, if they felt as though it's time for change, to each his own.

"Everybody's entitled to change. Sometimes change is better, sometimes change is worse."

It appears the change has paid off for both teams, although several Wildcat players admitted the departed coaches still left their mark in Manhattan.

"Coach Venables is one of my mentors," Williams said. "He taught me a lot that I know, as far as football and the life aspect. So I'll be looking forward to speaking to everybody."

Beisel echoed Williams' sentiments.

"I respect those guys greatly," he said. "They're one of the reasons I came to Kansas State in the first place. I don't look down on them for moving on and expanding their careers, and they've definitely moved on and made the most of it."

"It's going to come down to who plays the best football on Saturday. It's not going to come down to anything in the past, any people from Oklahoma, any people from Kansas State. It's going to come down to who plays the best football."

Chris Claybon, running back

Beisel even went on to accredit the former Cat assistants for building a framework for the K-State defenses of the future.

"I think Coach Venables and Coach (Mike) Stoops definitely laid a foundation here for us," he said. "We had a great defense while they were here, and we've just continued to move on as well as they have down at OU.

"We're not looking back, and I know they're not looking back, and it's going to be a great rivalry coming in here for the both of us. There's a lot of players on both sides of the ball that are familiar with both coaching staffs, and it's going to be fun."

From a coaching standpoint, Bennett said he has no hard feelings in facing his former team, either.

"I had a great experience at OU — it's a neat place," he said. "The people there are good people, they're football fans, and I, of course, know quite a few of the people still there and the players. And I'm happy for their success, but I don't want it to come at our expense."

That expense would be a Sooner victory this Saturday.

However, the simple fact that the Sooner program is in that position to win is regarded remarkably by some, as OU's winning record (7-5) last season was their first since 1993.

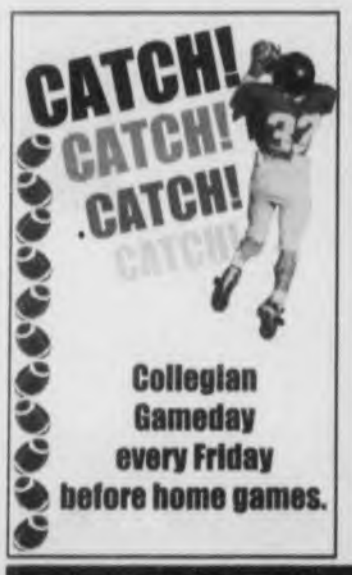
Yet, Snyder laughed at the thought that Bud Wilkinson (1947-1963), Oklahoma's second all-time winningest head coach with a career record of 145-29-4, was rolling over in his grave now that four former K-State coaches have resurrected the Oklahoma program.

"I don't think he's bothered by that," Snyder said. "Just being the splendid gentleman that he was, I think he would handle it like you would expect Bud Wilkinson to deal with it.

"I had the very good fortune of being able to meet him, and it was my belief that he was all that everyone perceived him to be — a very, very special man."

Regardless of the marquee matchup pitting Snyder's former assistants against him, the Cat head coach said he still has a good relationship with Bob.

"Our relationship goes back a long ways, and I always perceived it as being a positive relationship while he was here," Snyder said. "We haven't communicated for quite some time, although I do see Bobby.



"I've seen him two or three times in the last year, and we talked about things that we're both interested in, families and so on. I've known his family for a long time. I knew his father when he was alive, and his uncle and all his brothers, and his mother. So we were able to share some information about that. But football, we don't really sit down and talk about football at all."

Yet, whether they talk about it or not, Bennett said the Cats need to go back to that attitude of battling their own flesh and blood Saturday.

"Yeah, it's going to be a game, but it's like playing your brother," he said. "You love him, but you want to beat him, too."

Fans break attendance record at ESPN 'Gameday'

KELLY GLASSCOCK/Collegian

Lee Corso donned a Willie head after Kirk Herbstreit gave his pre-game prediction of a Sooner victory. More than 15,000 fans came to KSU Stadium for ESPN "College Gameday." Herbstreit's pick proved right after K-State lost to then-No. 8 Oklahoma 41-31.

ESPN mission: accomplished.

K-State fans made a wish their command Saturday morning when they regained the unofficial record for largest attendance at an ESPN "College Gameday" telecast.

A primarily purple crowd of 15,587 filled the east side of KSU Stadium to watch Lee Corso, Chris Fowler and Kirk Herbstreit broadcast live from the Little Apple.

According to officials at ESPN, K-State had previously held the unofficial attendance record in 1998 for a "Gameday" telecast not immediately involving a game, when an estimated 10,000 fans attended the K-State/Nebraska contest.

However, Virginia Tech drew crowds of 12,000 and 15,000 for broadcasts in Blacksburg, Va., last season, which gave Wildcat fans an incentive to top the Hokies, K-State Sports Information Director Doug Dull said.

To say the least, Cat fans were enthusiastic to have "Gameday" in Manhattan.

"It's been my lifelong dream to be on ESPN," Neal Troyer, sophomore in bio-ag engineering, said. "Today will be a day that I'll tell my grandchildren about."

Troyer, along with several friends, were in the front row for "Gameday," with each of their chests painted with a purple symbol spelling: "K-STATE #1."

Yet, that kind of spirit is a common element found in true Wildcat fans, Dustin Fisher, sophomore in criminal justice, said.

"I've had season tickets forever. It gets crazier and crazier every year," he said. "The fans here, like the football team, are undoubtedly the best in the nation."

And despite K-State's 41-31 loss to Oklahoma, that fan support and dedication continues, as quarterback Jonathan Beasley said he was pleased to see the fan loyalty to the football program.

In fact, the crowd in the north end zone gave the Cats a round of applause as they headed toward the locker room.

"I appreciate the fans," Beasley said. "They stuck with us even when we got down by 21 points, and they were still trying to get us in the game — and we had to make some big plays to get them back in the game, too. So I give our fans credit for sticking with us."

Beasley added that the record turnout at ESPN "Gameday" was also indicative of Cat fans' enthusiasm and devotion to K-State football.

"That's showing that we've got great fan support," he said, "and hopefully those guys will come out next week and cheer us on like they did this week."

And they will, as David Fuller, freshman in pre-med, said Cat fans are still optimistic for a national championship.

"We've got purple running through our veins. I can't wait until we get to Miami so we can paint that city purple, too."

Illegal ID sales under scrutiny

By SCOTT ALDIS-WILSON
Kansas State Collegian

With K-State IDs now required to get into the student sections of football games, some students are trying to sell their Wildcat ID cards along with the tickets. Whether they know it or not, though, the process is illegal.

A case last week of two K-State undergraduate students offering to sell their Wildcat Cards online indicates some are raising the stakes to resell their student football tickets.

IDs have long been required to purchase student tickets, but students could easily resell their tickets to non-students.

"Once they leave our hands, they're out of our control," Carol Adolph, Athletic Ticket Manager, said.

However, a new policy from the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics now states that an ID is also necessary to enter the game. The policy, which began with the Sept. 23

Lip sync launches spirit week

By LYNNE HERMANSEN
Kansas State Collegian

Homecoming Week 2000 began Sunday afternoon with plenty of song and dance.

A lip sync and dance contest called Wildcat Request Live kicked off a week of activities. The new homecoming event, geared for the greek community, was designed to parody a popular MTV show, Daniel Baker, senior in biology, said.

Homecoming Week 2000

"The original idea was to go with a variety show, but we decided to have an event similar to 'Total Request Live' on MTV," Baker said.

Eighteen people competed in pairs with a five-minute time limit for each performance. The students were graded on their overall performance, lead character's performance and choreography.

Baker said he hopes the event as a

2 Korean War veterans meet again after 35 years

By MICHELLE BERTUGLIA
Kansas State Collegian

After 35 years, two Korean War veterans and Kansas natives were reunited when they attended a commemorative ceremony Friday at Fort Riley.

Retired Sgt. Edward Branch and retired Sgt. Charles Klenclen said they became friends when they were stationed together at Fort Riley for their basic training in February 1952.

They were shipped to Korea and shipped back to America together after the war. After their return, the two veterans lost touch for 35 years. Now, they often attend memorial ceremonies, like the one at Fort Riley, together.

Soldiers stand at attention after firing a 21-gun salute in remembrance of those who lost their lives in the Korean War. A ceremony to honor veterans of the Korean War was held Friday afternoon on Cavalry Parade Field in Fort Riley.

Klenclen said they have gone to other ceremonies in Salina and Abilene and that it was hard to be back at Fort Riley.

"The fort has really changed," he said. "It is hard to see old places torn down."

More than 850 other retired veterans of the Korean war attended the ceremony Friday afternoon on Cavelry Parade Field to be honored for their participation in what some have deemed "the forgotten war."

On the golden anniversary of the Korean War, Fort Riley and the 24th Infantry Division (Mechanized) gave a commemorative ceremony honoring those who fought for our country in Korea.

Over the next three years, Fort Riley will serve as an official commemorative community of the war.

Gen. Robert St. Onge said having Fort Riley as a commemorative site is an honor.

The theme of the ceremony was, "Lest we forget as we respectfully remember the past while moving forward together." Throughout the ceremony soldiers paraded on Cavalry Parade Field and performed demonstrations for the veterans, including a traditional inspection of the troops.

At the ceremony, Onge spoke to the crowd and thanked the veterans for their service and dedication.

Onge said Korea might have been a war without a victory but rather their campaign paved the way for the successes of our lives today.

During the ceremony, each veteran was awarded a certificate and a gold lapel pin that served to exemplify the veteran's honor, duty and sacrifices made to the country.

The deceased veterans were honored with a 21-gun salute and the playing of "Taps."

Branch said the ceremony was a joyous occasion for him.

"We sure never got anything like this when we came back from the war," he said. "Just being here today feels good."

Klenclen said he felt Korean War veterans deserve special ceremonies for their contributions, the reason he said he attends so many.

"We enjoy being recognized," he said. "We deserve it for what we were up against."

Pfc. Dawn Casselman said she attended the ceremony out of respect for the veterans and all they did for the country. For Casselman, the ceremony was inspiring.

"After seeing the ceremony today, it makes you want to stay in the army and do something for the country," Casselman said.

USS Cole strives to stay afloat

By PAULINE JELINEK
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON D.C. — The hobbled USS Cole lost power and took on more water in Yemen's harbor on Sunday, and the Clinton administration renewed its pledge to be relentless in tracking down those responsible for its bombing.

In what he called "a minor setback" to recovery operations, naval operations chief Adm. Vern Clark said the ship's crew was working to restore electrical power needed for communications and to pump water out of the destroyer, which has a huge hole in its hull.

"They're heroes — they're fighting for their ship," he said on CBS' "Face the Nation."

The power had been restored Thursday after a suspected terrorist bombing blew a 40-by-40 foot hole in the Cole, killing 17 sailors.

But officials said the generator system inexplicably failed again Sunday, stopping pumps and causing additional flooding.

The crew brought the flooding under control, Clark said.

Meantime, Defense Secretary William Cohen said there was no doubt that the explosion was an intentional bombing.

"We don't know who did it but ... we're satisfied this was clearly an act of terrorism," he said on CBS.

"We will be relentless in tracking down the individuals or groups who are responsible for this, and we will see to it that they are held accountable"

President Clinton's national security adviser defended the Navy's decision to dock ships in Yemen. Sandy Berger said limited fueling options in the Persian Gulf require such stops despite the high risk of terrorism.

"This entire area is a high threat area. The military has taken substantial steps in this area," he said on NBC's "Meet the Press."

Berger said 25 ships have refueled in the Arabian Peninsula port of Aden in the past 18 months "without incident."

"Obviously we have to find out what, if anything, happened in this particular case," Berger said.

U.S. officials believe the ship was the target of a suicide attack from a small vessel packed with powerful explosives. If terrorism is proved, it would be the deadliest such attack on the U.S. military since the bombing of an Air Force barracks in Saudi Arabia in 1996 that killed 19.

Secretary of State Madeleine Albright said on ABC's "This Week" that she thinks the inquiry is

Plane wreckage removed from Wichita crash site

WICHITA — Workers have removed the burned fuselage of the Bombardier Challenger 604 business jet from a city street, where it had lain since Tuesday's fatal crash.

The fuselage was taken Friday to a Bombardier Aerospace warehouse at Wichita's Mid-Continent Airport. National Transportation Safety Board investigators will examine the wreckage there, Dave Franson, a spokesman for Bombardier, said.

The plane went down on the street near the airport's southwest corner, while taking off.

The cause of the crash remains unknown, and the street remained closed on Saturday. The NTSB is expected to post a preliminary report on its Web site in the next couple of days, Franson said.

The report will not say what caused the crash, but will provide a preliminary report of some of the findings, he said.

Debris from the crash followed the path of the aircraft after the impact, Franson said. The field of debris covered nearly the length of four football fields.

Bombardier experimental test pilot Bryan Irelan, 33, and flight-test engineer David Riggs, 48, were killed in the crash. A third crew member, flight-test pilot Eric Fiore, 33, remains in critical condition at the Via Christi Regional Medical Center Burn Center-St. Francis Campus. All three men were from Wichita.

Agriculture leaders address agricultural economy

By TANNER EHMKE
Kansas State Collegian

While the nation's economy continues to make record progress, young farmers are finding it increasingly difficult to return to the farm.

However, two leaders of the agricultural industry are making the future a little brighter for struggling farmers and college students. Those involved in agriculture had the opportunity to voice their concerns to them and listen to their opinions.

Sen. Pat Roberts, R-Kan., and Barry Flinchbaugh, a K-State agricultural economist, discussed the future of the agricultural economy in a forum Friday in the Union's Little Theatre.

The forum, titled "Ag Policy for a New Generation," was part of a college tour sponsored by AgriTalk, a daily agricultural news-radio program broadcast nationwide to syndicate radio stations.

The senator and the agricultural economist, both regarded as authorities of agriculture at the state and national level, answered questions from an audience comprised mostly of Flinchbaugh's agricultural policy class.

"These young people have to understand we are in a global market," Roberts said. "We must have access to education and technology to have precision agriculture."

Both Roberts and Flinchbaugh said that in order for commercial farmers to be capable of making a living on the farm, political action must be taken. In 1996, the two joined forces to create the current farm bill called "Freedom to Farm."

The legislation changed 63 years of farm subsidies by decoupling government payments to farmers, allowing individual producers to grow crops without government restrictions.

Roberts said the bill restores decision-making back to the farmer.

"We must make a competitive market in which to operate in order to have a future," Roberts said. "That's the bottom line."

Flinchbaugh cited four courses of action that need to be taken in order for commercial agriculture to be more efficient: marketing loans to farmers, farm-savings accounts, counter-cyclical income payments and crop revenue insurance that is under debate with the Roberts-Keary Bill.

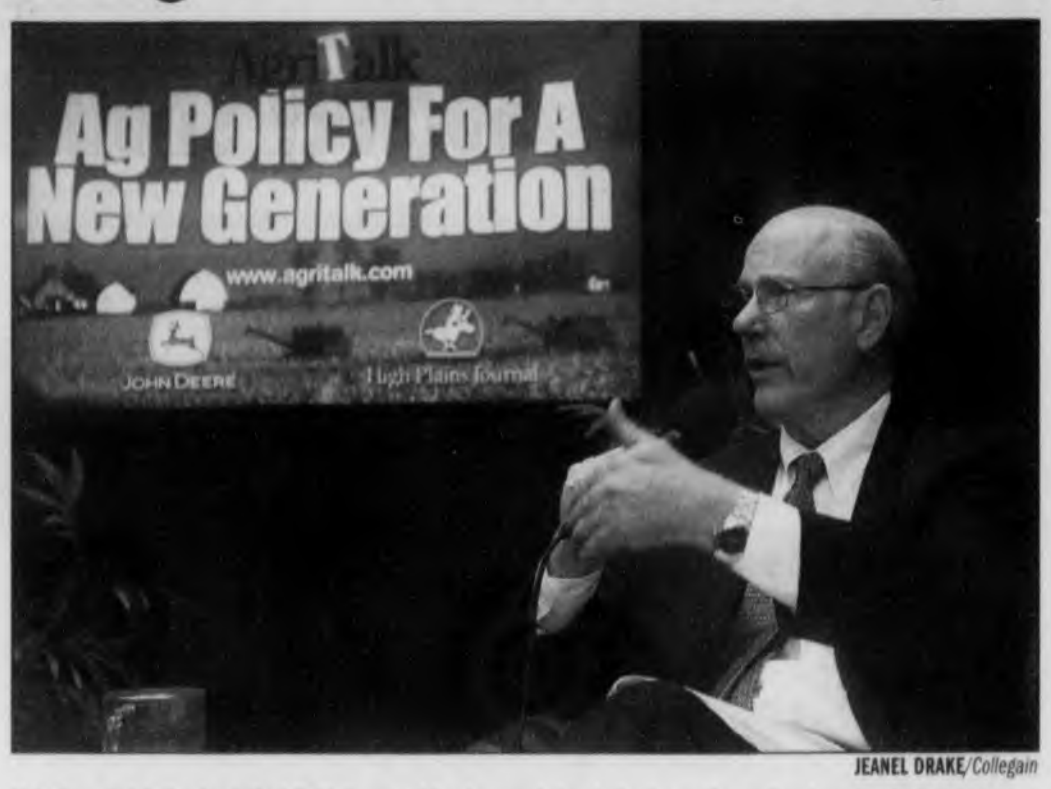
Flinchbaugh stressed the importance for American producers to be the low-cost producers in the world market in order to compete.

Josh Herrmann, senior in agricultural economics, asked Roberts and Flinchbaugh what action will be taken concerning embargoes and sanctions on foreign states.

"We need something in the next farm bill about using food as a weapon instead of using diplomacy," Herrmann said.

"Until they do something about using food as a weapon, agriculture will not be what it once was 20 to 30 years ago."

Roberts said using the farmer as a weapon is counter-productive, yet it happens in every administration. He said there are times when sanctions must be imposed on a country.



The forum will be broadcast nationwide from 10 to 11 a.m. Nov. 6 on affiliate stations. The tour will continue to Iowa State University on Oct. 27 and to Ohio on Nov. 28.

The debate brings together agricultural economists and important players of agriculture.

Union dedication ceremony acknowledges K-State leaders

By SHAWN HEIN
Kansas State Collegian

Nearly 2 1/2 years of remodeling in the K-State Student Union were recognized on Friday morning.

Several distinguished K-Staters were a part of the renovation dedication, "Union 2000 — A Vision Becomes a Reality," at the Union Plaza.

President Jon Wefald, Student Body President Jake Worcester and Dean of Student Life Pat Bosco were among those on hand to offer comments about the renovations.

The Union enhancement project timeline included the expansion of the food court on the structure's second floor, renovation of the Little Theatre and the Union Plaza project.

Renovations to the Union, which began May 1998, cost an estimated $11.5 million.

In a proclamation read by Union Governing Board President Ryan Evans, Gov. Bill Graves said the improvements in the Union are a direct result of everybody at K-State working together.

"Through students, faculty and staff leadership the Student Union is now a facility that can function and respond to the 21st century needs and expectations," Graves wrote.

Wefald said the completion of the renovations is truly something special.

"This is a dream come true," he said.

"I know from past generations of students who came together to build the student Union in the first place."

Wefald credited many people for the progress of the Union, including Amy Rene, president of the KSU Alumni Association, Jack Sills, former director of the Union, and Manhattan mayor Karen McColloh.

The efforts of the current director of the Union, Bernard Pitts, were instrumental during the renovations, Wefald said.

"We could not have done it without Bernard Pitts, who kept this student Union open with all this construction going on," he said.

Wefald also announced he would use a donation of $100,000 given to the school on the Little Theatre. The money would go towards a state-of-the-art telecommunications system in the theatre.

The renovation of the Union is the type of project Worcester said he is glad to work on.

"If this is the kind of decision that's made before I come in, I want to get stuck with a lot of them, because this is a fantastic project that has really come together and is an outstanding area on campus for students to congregate," Worcester said.

Weekend loss should not dim pride, support

Purple pride should not be dimmed after K-State's 31 to 41 fall to Oklahoma.

In fact, Catbackers need to prove they are not fair-weather fans.

This is the time the football players need to be supported, not shunned because they may have fallen off of the high pedestal their fans have placed them on.

It is time to put the OU game behind us and move on. The Wildcats need to continue to set their sights on their biggest goal — beating Nebraska. And we need to continue to hope our red rival wins its games before it faces off against us.

Beating Nebraska would be a speed-bump rather than a roadblock on our way to the Big 12 Championship. If things work out in our favor, there is a strong possibility K-State might get a chance to take on Oklahoma once again.

If that day arrives, we will have an advantage. Saturday's game was in OU's favor — the Stoops brothers have seen the K-State football program from the inside and know how these players work.

However, now that the Wildcats have been introduced to the Sooners' style of play, a rematch would mean a more experienced K-State squad.

K-State fans need to maintain a high level of sportsmanship. We need to focus our energy not at anger for our opponents, but instead for a sense of encouragement for our own team.

There is still half of the season left. If your heart does bleed purple, now is the time to show it.

Society should accept same-sex marriage

TERRY WELCH

If you can count on anything when dealing with other people, it's their ability to surprise you by not being able to be counted on.

Take Dick Cheney, for example. Here is a man who I counted on to be a typical conservative line-toer, who turns out to be a man thoughtful and intelligent enough to challenge his own party's position on same-sex marriage.

True, he did it in what could euphemistically be called a "diplomatic" fashion, lacking any evidence of real political cojones, but he did it nonetheless. He said this about the issue during the debate: "I try to be open-minded about it as much as I can and tolerant of those relationships."

And like Joe Lieberman, I also wrestle with the extent to which there ought to be legal sanction of those relationships. I think we ought to do everything we can to tolerate and accommodate whatever kind of relationships people want to enter into.

This statement, though somewhat wishy-washy, seems to be one of the best made by any of the four main candidates on this issue during this election season. Gore only said during the debate last week that he supported civic unions and Lieberman basically implied the same.

The time seems to be ripe, though, for someone to make a much stronger statement. In the past year, the barriers to this right for homosexuals has begun to crumble (due to the Vermont Supreme Court ruling) and, it's true, the U.S. Supreme Court most likely will be the force that destroys the barrier once and for all. It would be nice, however, if one person could show the leadership required to say that laws preventing same-sex marriage are misguided and ridiculous.

What keeps politicians from making such a statement is public opinion. A January Gallup poll found that 62 percent of us believe that gay marriages should not be recognized and homosexual couples should not have the same rights as heterosexual couples — the right to make medical decisions for partners, the rights of survivorship, etc. The question is why? Why do Americans fear gay marriages?

One novel suggestion can be found on the Concerned Women for America Web site, which says, in part, that it would be a legal headache, considering the fact that homosexual unions would conflict with existing sodomy laws. This seems a disingenuous argument. Consider the fact that oral sex is one of the types of sexual activity listed as sodomy by nearly every state with existing sodomy laws, including Kansas.

The real reason that people have a problem with same-sex marriage can be found in the transcript of Thursday's presidential debate.

George W. Bush said he sees marriage as a "sacred institution between a man and a woman." My church and I would agree. However, when we attempt to legislate according to our personal definitions of "sacred," we are going down the wrong road. The things that are sacred to me are not sacred to others. There are some churches that would have no problem with gay marriages and would consider them as sacred as any other.

The aforementioned CWA Web site uses the American Heritage Dictionary definition of marriage, saying that it is a "union between a man and a woman." They leave out, however, the word "legal" before union. The truth is that the state should see marriages as they see any other exchange of legal documentation and not through the prism of religion.

Should the state disallow gay mortgages? Same-sex auto sales? If the state were forced to base its view of marriage on the Christian view of matrimony as a holy institution, wouldn't it have to pretty much outlaw divorce?

Homosexuals are one of the last groups of people in America who can be discriminated against legally. Marriage is just the tip of the iceberg. (Although, as Andrew Sullivan wrote in "Virtually Normal," "If nothing else were done at all, and gay marriage were legalized, 90 percent of the political work necessary to achieve gay and lesbian equality would have been achieved.")

Republicans have repeatedly blocked legislation that would add sexual orientation to the Equal Opportunity Act's list of reasons for which you can't fire or avoid hiring employees. One reason for this reticence might be seen in another of Bush's statements made Thursday. The governor, answering a question about the Employment Non-Discrimination Act, said that it shouldn't be any of his concern "how you conduct your sex life." This statement represents a commonly used conservative fall back position (which seems to apply to homosexuals but not Democratic presidents). The twisted part of this response is that they refuse to admit that homosexuality is not an issue of "sex life," but of love.

If conservatives define homosexuality and heterosexuality solely by sex acts, it's a wonder that they can consider any union truly sacred.

Green Party candidate represents common citizen

guest view
CASEY PARKS

In 1996, a mere 49 percent of the American population exercised its right to vote for a president, a record low in voter turnout rates.

American citizens, subjected to voting for the lesser of two evils every four years, have become increasingly disgusted with our political system.

So what are the options for citizens in the year 2000? Standing one step away from becoming Commander in Chief are two look-alike politicians, differing on only a handful of highly publicized issues.

While both George W. Bush and Al Gore are preocupied with pleasing corporate America, the interests of the average working-class citizen are completely ignored. I have had all I can stand of this evil of two lessors.

I am voting for Ralph Nader.

Nader, the presidential candidate for the Green Party, enters the political arena with an integrity unequaled by other politicians and an impressive track record of standing up to money-hungry corporate giants. For the past 40 years, Nader has been working in Washington, D.C., helping to pass numerous laws protecting both consumer rights and the safety of the average American.

Nader refuses to compromise his ideals, even in the face of eminent defeat this November. Judging politicians requires looking at what they have done, not what they say they will do. While both the vice president and the governor employ sound bite politics and are willing to say whatever it takes to win this election, Nader's history in Washington speaks for itself.

Further separating Nader from his competitors is the fact that he cannot be bought, which is evidenced by his unwillingness to accept any campaign donation larger than $1,000. On the other hand, both Bush and Gore haul in millions of dollars in corporate soft money contributions. Whose backside will either of these two Republicrats be covering while in office — the average student from K-State or Exxon Oil Company's?

Nader defines the only difference between his two main opponents as the "relative velocity with which their knees hit the floor when corporate America comes knocking."

Nader's unfailing integrity and tireless commitment to the public interest are further exemplified by his unwavering devotion towards environmental concerns in our nation. A majority of the environmental problems in the United States stem from our government's unwillingness to crack down on multinational corporations that endanger public health and exploit natural resources.

Nader proposes ending all public subsidies and tax breaks for those corporations whose actions harm the environment. Throughout psuedo-environmentalist Gore's eight years as vice president fuel-efficiency standards remained stationary, and the automobile industry continued to receive a free ride from the government.

"The pervasive environmental violence of air pollutants has imperiled health, safety and property for many decades," Nader said. Without action taken against these corporate polluters the downward spiral toward environmental destruction will continue unabated.

Although Nader's ideals and beliefs appeal to many Americans, some citizens fear that voting for Nader will hurt Gore's chances, thus leading directly to Bush being elected president. Others think a vote for Nader is a wasted vote, since it is obvious he will not win the presidential election.

In addressing these concerns, I can state the obvious: Bush will undoubtedly carry the state of Kansas. Therefore a vote for Nader will not harm Gore's campaign and, in fact, a vote for Gore in Kansas is the wasted vote.

By contrast, a vote for Nader can make a difference. If Nader receives at least 5 percent of the popular vote this November, the Green Party will be entitled to federal funding during the 2004 election. This outcome would help to even the political playing field, resulting in a giant step toward representing the interests of working-class Americans in Washington, D.C.

If you are interested in learning more about Nader and his platform, log on to www.votenader.com. Similarly, a student organization called Campus Greens is in the process of being recognized at K-State. I encourage students interested in political activism on behalf of Ralph Nader and the Green Party to check out the Campus Greens, and for more information please contact me via e-mail.

As a body of voters, college-age students in America have the power to rescue our deteriorating democracy. However, a blanket of political apathy rests over the young adults of our nation, and the voter turnout percentage for college-age students in a paltry 32 percent.

Although we are capable of bringing down the two-party duopoly that holds our nation in a suffocating chokehold, change cannot be accomplished without participation in the voting process.

As Nov. 7 draws nearer, I urge you to remember Nader's words quoted from Rage Against the Machine's music video "Testify," "If you don't turn onto politics, politics will turn on you."

Column failed to represent positives of voucher system

Editor,

Zac Cook's column on Tuesday regarding school vouchers raised some truths about vouchers, but had a few elements that were not correct.

He mentioned parents using charter schools with the vouchers provided; this cannot be. Charter schools do not cost money as they are part of the public school systems of individual municipalities, etc. This is at least the case in the city I come from and the city I presently live in.

Vouchers are, however, under fire because they can be used to aid parents in sending children to, say, a neighborhood parochial school that charges tuition, something that once was not possible without that voucher money.

In Kansas, we have relatively few cities of great size, and within them the public schools are not troubled to the extent some schools are in large U.S. cities.

For example, you can still feel confident attending Topeka High School and the same goes for most high schools in Wichita. But in very large cities, some schools are seemingly devastated because social issues in the home are making students that are not ready to be at school, nor are they open to really connecting with a teacher or curriculum. It is not merely the fault of public schools in cities, rather, the home plays a significant role.

I have worked in the Philadelphia public schools and had a wonderful experience. I met a diverse groups of students who were eager to succeed. That is not to say there were no problems. I worked in a magnet high school, as well as a neighborhood school. Urban public schools are not "black holes," they are full of successes just like suburban districts.

I think we are trained perhaps by media or by the consensus of peers, the city schools mean bad news. Often, many of us come to such a conclusion without having ever known someone from a city school or having attended one.

Vouchers are a way of appeasing parents tired of a fallen neighborhood school, and many parents may not realize that their child's home life is affecting them more than the school they are attending. There is no perfect education and surely everyone can agree on that.

Public schools do deserve a lot of attention. Vouchers will not solve problems in the long term, as Zac pointed out, but we must also realize that urban schools and other districts that are seen widely as failing, do have many bright spots and warrant much attention for that.

It is time to stop pointing fingers in American education and realize that urban or suburban, troubled or untroubled, we, as a nation, are in the quest to create well-educated citizens together. It is time to give every public school a chance and believe in them.

Volunteers of annual blood drive deserve recognition

Editor,

The K-State faculty, students and the entire Manhattan community deserve much thanks for the support they gave during the Red Cross K-State Blood Drive.

The drive is planned every semester by a committee of dedicated representatives from campus organizations along with other individuals. They helped coordinate the many details of the week, from publicity to signing up volunteers. While we were nine short of the goal of 875 pints, the total was still up from last October's drive, making last week a very productive and worthwhile effort.

Everyone who stopped by any of the blood drive locations was invited to enter the daily drawing for gift certificates and other coupons donated by area businesses.

The winners were: Londa VanderWal, Lindsey Rapoff, Mari Smith, Richard Kelderhouse, Chelle Kaczmarek, Jaime Schmidt, Pavel Franc, Cristine Nighswonger and Mike Cowan.

The spring blood drive will be April 2-6. We hope to see everyone there.

Peace summit not expected to end 18-day conflict in Middle East

By GREG MYRE
The Associated Press

JERUSALEM — After more than two weeks of clashes, many Israelis and Palestinians agreed Sunday on a pessimistic forecast: a peace summit in Egypt won't solve any slight problems or relieve the current state of bitterness.

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak and Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat both head into Monday's summit at Sharm el-Sheik, Egypt, as reluctant participants with low expectations.

Each leader has constituents who advised them not to go, and Palestinian gunmen fired automatic rifles into the air outside Arafat's office Sunday night to express their opposition.

Arafat came to the front gate of the compound to explain his decision to the crowd of about 200.

"We are going to Sharm el-Sheik, but taking with us the condition of the Palestinian people," Arafat said. "We are on the way to Jerusalem until a Palestinian child raises the Palestinian flag on the walls of Jerusalem."

The crowd cheered, chanting, "With our blood, and with our soul, we will defend you."

In Jerusalem, Barak spoke with President Clinton shortly before the president departed for the summit.

"The two leaders agreed there would be no preconditions for the talks and that each side would present its positions during the meeting," Barak's office said in a statement.

Many frustrated Palestinians believe Arafat will face intense pressure to sign an unfavorable agreement at the summit, which will include leaders from the United States, Egypt, Jordan and the United Nations.

"Arafat shouldn't go because Barak will not give anything to us," said Annan Amr, 19, a Palestinian student. "We are here to get our rights by fighting because this is the language Israel knows."

Most Israelis were also downbeat, questioning whether the Palestinian leadership was sincere about ending the worst violence since the two sides began regular peace talks in 1993.

"I think Arafat doesn't want an agreement," said Niv Cohen, 22, a Jew who recently completed his army service. Arafat's "target is to keep the area violent."

Two Israeli soldiers were lightly wounded by gunfire Sunday from the Jordanian border, according to officials in both countries. There was no word on who fired at the Israelis, who were outside the West Bank town of Jericho. Both sides were investigating.

Also, one Palestinian died of wounds suffered Wednesday. But no major battles were reported as violence continued to abate.

The summit's aim is relatively modest, though by no means assured. The parties will try to arrange a cease-fire, ending fighting that has claimed nearly 100 lives, most of them Palestinian, since erupting 18 days ago.

Kidnapping of Israeli reserve soldier could increase international hostilities, tensions

The Associated Press

JERUSALEM — Israel's Defense Ministry confirmed Sunday that one of its reserve soldiers had been kidnapped outside the country.

The ministry did not name the soldier or say who kidnapped him or where, but the announcement came just hours after the militant Islamic group Hezbollah said in Lebanon that it had seized an Israeli colonel.

The reservist "was kidnapped after he left Israel of his own will for personal reasons," the Defense Ministry said.

It called the kidnapping "a serious act and contradicts all norms of international justice."

Media reports in Israel said the unidentified man was seized recently in Europe.

The kidnapping threatened to heighten tensions in an already volatile region as international leaders were preparing for a Palestinian-Israeli summit to put an end to weeks of hostilities.

Earlier in the day, Hezbollah chief Sheik Hassan Nasrallah had said an Israeli army colonel working with one of the Israeli security agencies was seized "in a complicated security operation." Details will be revealed "at the appropriate time," he said in an announcement broadcast on Lebanese television and the Iranian-backed Hezbollah's own TV station.

There was no immediate confirmation that the Hezbollah claim and the Israeli statement referred to the same person.

In Israel, Channel Two television quoted an unidentified Israeli official as saying the man was a businessman kidnapped by partners in a business deal in Europe, and that he was transferred to Hezbollah. Israeli security officials, speaking on condition of anonymity, said the kidnapping took place in Switzerland.

In Switzerland, federal police spokesman Rolf Debrunner said authorities were checking the report but had no immediate information.

On Oct. 7, Hezbollah captured three Israeli soldiers along Lebanon's border with Israel and said it wanted to swap them for dozens, perhaps hundreds, of Arab prisoners held in Israel. The United Nations has attempted to mediate in that capture, so far without success.

Israel holds 15 Lebanese prisoners, including two guerrilla leaders. Palestinians have asked Hezbollah to include about 1,600 Palestinian prisoners in any swap.

Middle East conflict introduces new elements to U.S. presidential election

By CALVIN WOODWARD
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Until now, voters have been able to consider Al Gore and George W. Bush in relative peace and quiet. No more.

Middle East conflict and the attack on a U.S. warship, combined with some economic nervousness at home, are introducing unpredictable elements into the campaign and perhaps forcing people to look at Democrat Gore and Republican Bush in new ways, late in the game.

Whether the new elements will be consequential is beyond the understanding of both campaigns. At this point, they are bewildered over how the violence and disquiet might play in the Nov. 7 election — as alert as campaigns always are for a so-called October surprise.

On one hand, Democrats consider Gore's years of experience as vice president a strength for him when matters overseas take a dangerous turn — a point Republican strategists and supporters do not dispute.

"I can see how that might make people look at the candidates differently, like, 'Can they lead us at a time like this?'" Mike Scanlon, a Bush supporter and General Motors project manager, said while awaiting the Republican nominee's speech at a Pontiac, Mich., truck assembly plant.

Democrat Dennis Dochterman said, at a Gore event in Cedar Rapids, Iowa: "When there's uncertainty, people are less inclined to take a chance."

On the other hand, it is a Clinton administration-mediated peace process that is falling apart between Israelis and Palestinians, and an economy that Gore has been running on that is causing some worries, with inflation up and the stock market swooning before rebounding Friday.

Gore strategists prefer smooth economic trends, public satisfaction with the nation's overall direction, and no rude shocks — however unrelated to the campaign — in newspaper headlines.

On Friday, a day after suspected terrorists blew a hole in the destroyer USS Cole in the port of Aden, Yemen, leaving 17 U.S. sailors dead, neither candidate was jousting for advantage.

The White House was playing it somewhat carefully, too, even while offering a platform for Gore to show his experience.

President Clinton's spokesman, Jake Siewert, welcomed Gore back as the candidate interrupted campaigning for a second day to join Clinton in meetings. But the White House did not exactly place him at the center of its crisis management.

While saying he'd let "the experts" decide whether the situation helps Gore, spokesman Chris Lehane took the occasion to trumpet the candidate's strengths.

"The bottom line is that he is involved because he has a wealth of experience on these issues," Lehane said while flying to Washington. "He is a valuable part of the foreign policy team at the White House."

It was a loss that ranked near the top of the list for linebacker Ben Leber.

"It's a lot of heartache. It's a tough loss to take and we worked so hard and invested so much time and effort into it," the junior captain said. "Any time you do that and it doesn't come out in your favor, it's always kind of tough to take."

And difficult it was, as Oklahoma (6-0) and a quartet of former K-State coaches stormed into KSU Stadium on Saturday and knocked off the Wildcats (6-1), 41-31.

The win boosted the eighth-ranked Sooners to No. 3 and 4 in the Associated Press and USA Today polls, respectively, while the then-No.2/3 ranked Cats fell to No. 10 and 8.

Yet, amid the hype of ABC Sports and ESPN "College Gameday" this weekend in Manhattan, head coach Bill Snyder said to give OU credit.

"Take nothing away from Oklahoma. They indeed were the best team this afternoon," he said, "but I'm not content that we played very well."

That perception, in part, stems from the Cats' uncharacteristic play on both sides of the football, strong safety Jarrod Cooper said, but that's an element that can't be dwelled upon.

"You've got to take everything positive or you're a crybaby," the senior captain said. "We dropped some balls, we missed some tackles — 'hey, don't do it next time,' that's all you can say.

"Monday starts a preparation for a whole new week and a whole new game

Saturday's game against Oklahoma may have started with two Heisman-candidate quarterbacks, but it ended with only one — and he was wearing red.

That man, Oklahoma's signal caller Josh Heupel, passed for 374 yards and two touchdowns, all against the No. 1 scoring defense in the nation.

K-State fans saw a legitimate Heisman candidate, no doubt about it, Oklahoma offensive coordinator Mark Mangino said.

"I think Josh Heupel ranks up there with the best players in America," he said. "For the mental aspect, for the leadership, for

Offense inconsistent with passes, runs

By MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

K-State vs. Oklahoma promised to be a shootout, but unfortunately, the Cats seemingly forgot their weapons for the majority of the game.

For the first three quarters, K-State managed only 228 total yards of offense and 21 points. Receivers dropped passes or were overthrown. Running plays were blown up by Oklahoma's defense. Nothing seemed to work consistently, head coach Bill Snyder said.

"We were just sporadic. There were times when we could run the ball, and times we could not. There were times when we throw it, and times when we couldn't," Snyder said. "There was far less consistency on offense than we have had at any time at any course of the season."

That inconsistency killed many of the Cats' drives. Because of the many incomplete passes — quarterback Jonathan Beasley went 14 for 36 on the day — K-State handicapped its play selection by getting itself into long yardage situations on third down, offensive coordinator Ron Hudson said.

"Jonathan played below what we anticipate Jonathan to be showing. He missed some throws that he's done before," Hudson said, "and as a result, when you have those throws missed and you have some dropped passes, you're in second-and-long or third-and-long, rather than second or third-and-short."

Those dropped passes were possibly the most inexplicable failure for the Cats. Both Quincy Morgan and Aaron Lockett, who are both normally sure-handed receivers, had trouble coming up with easy catches. While those drops don't indicate anything about the talent of those wide-outs, it could say something worse, Hudson said.

"Maybe just the fact that it was a big game like this, maybe we just didn't respond like you'd like to think we'd respond," he said.

Blaming the entire loss on the players would be unfair, however.

The plays called by the coaches also failed to put K-State into scoring situations. For instance, the Cats' passing game became almost limited to throwing the ball deep, but the schemes might have worked if the players had run them correctly, Snyder said.

"We took the ball downfield probably more than we should. I thought we had some opportunities," he said. "But of course, we're throwing the ball outside underneath, and we're putting the ball on the ground."

Some of K-State's offensive struggles should be accredited to Oklahoma. Many times when Beasley looked downfield, his receivers just weren't open due to superior coverage by the Sooner defensive backs, Oklahoma free safety J.T. Thatcher said.

"They're a very good offensive team, and they have very fast receivers, so they're going to try and beat you deep, and what we had to do was stay deep with them and don't let them get behind us," Thatcher said.

"We had to keep them in front of us and just make tackles. Tackle — that's what we had to do."

Despite the tough Sooner defense, K-State still shot itself in the foot by falling behind early, Hudson said.

"When you're down 38-14, that's hard to come back from anywhere, but we had time to do it, and we didn't get it done," he said.

"Plain and simple, we did not get it done."

Record numbers

Saturday's attendance of 53,011 sets a new KSU Stadium record. The previous mark was 52,254 vs. Kansas last season (Oct. 9, 1999). It's the seventh crowd in excess of 50,000 spectators in stadium history.

Streak snapper

K-State's loss ends several streaks for the Wildcats: 25 straight home victories, 13 consecutive wins in the month of October and five wins in a row against Oklahoma.

First-time failure

The Wildcats didn't score on its first possession for the first time this season. K-State had scored a touchdown on its first drive in each of the six previous games.

Time capsule

The 41 points scored by the Sooners on Saturday are the most registered against the Wildcats in Manhattan in a decade, as Nebraska notched a 45-8 win in 1990. In addition, OU's 31 points through the first 30 minutes of play are the most surrendered by K-State in the opening half since the Cornhuskers put up 35 points on the Cats 10 years ago.

Block party

K-State recorded its third blocked punt of the season when junior Drew Thalmann blocked the Sooners' attempt early in the fourth quarter. The Cats also blocked a pair of North Texas punts on Sept. 23.

Running wild

With two rushing touchdowns Saturday, senior quarterback Jonathan Beasley tied K-State's single-season record for rushing TD's. Beasley has registered 14 for the season, equivalent to marks held by both Bill Butler (1971) and Michael Bishop (1998).

More on Beasley

Throwing for 211 yards against Oklahoma, Beasley moved into seventh place on the K-State all-time passing charts with 3,576 yards, surpassing Dennis Morrison's career total of 3,428 yards. Beasley also had a streak snapped Saturday. On his ninth pass of the day, he threw an interception, ending his mark of 100 consecutive pass attempts without a pick.

Lucky Seventh

Senior wide-out Quincy Morgan, who entered the game tied for the lead nationally with eight TD receptions, went over the 100-yard receiving barrier for the seventh time in his career.

That ties him with Darnell McDonald for third on the K-State all-time 100-yard receiving game list. His 123 yards Saturday also moves him into sixth place on the career receiving yardage charts.

Senior superlative

Fullback Johnno Lazetich made his first reception as a Wildcat in the second quarter against OU, a 27-yard completion from Beasley.

— by Monday this is gone."

Yet, defensive coordinator Phil Bennett said he can't remember poorer tackling by his Wildcat unit. Even Snyder reiterated the importance of wrapping up, an issue that's been discussed from the beginning.

"Since the halftime of the Iowa game, we've addressed that," Snyder said. "We've just proven that we're not the kind of tackling football team that we need to be. Great defensive football team's are great tackling teams. You've all heard that nomenclature, and that's pretty accurate. And we're not a very good tackling football team."

Missed tackles took their toll on the Wildcats on Saturday.

Just 5 1/2 minutes into the second half with OU looking at third-and-26 on their own 26-yard line, Sooner QB Josh Heupel hit receiver Antwone Savage on a short pass on the right sideline. But, Savage would elude five would-be tacklers on his way to a 74-yard touchdown and a 38-14 lead.

That play had an effect on the game's outcome as the Cats began to come alive in the last quarter.

After a third period field goal by senior placekicker Jamie Rheem, wide-out Quincy Morgan started things off in the final quarter, eluding a few tacklers of his own en route to a 69-yard TD reception from quarterback Jonathan Beasley, cutting the OU advantage to 38-24.

Then, the Cat special teams unit did its part.

With OU facing fourth-and-19 from its own 28-yard line, junior Drew Thalmann broke straight through the middle of the OU punt team, smothering the Sooner kick. The ball was recovered and returned 16 yards for a touchdown by Terence Newman, bringing new life to the Cats and slicing the deficit in half, 38-31.

"That was a great play that got the swing going even more and the momentum switched," junior free safety Jon McGraw said, "and it really put us in good position to come back and win that game."

The Cats would get that opportunity, at least for a tie.

On first down in K-State territory, Heupel pitched the ball to running back Renaldo Works, who ran right and pulled up, looking to throw. McGraw sniffed out the halfback pass and intercepted Works' attempt, intended for Savage, at K-State's 11, giving Beasley a chance to drive.

But they stalled, as the Sooner defense forced a three-and-out, and OU would add a 24-yard field goal by Tim Duncan to put icing on the cake.

Bennett said it's pretty obvious who should have won Saturday.

"You have to be honest with yourself — they played better than we did," he said. "I'm not sure we deserved to win the game."

Snyder said the Cats will need to get better if they hope for a rematch against Oklahoma in the 2000 Dr Pepper Big 12 Championship.

"I would like to be in a position to do that," he said. "Your destiny is in your own hands, and it truly is in that respect, but it's always been that way. We'll get wherever we deserve to be."

Nevertheless, Snyder's players are optimistic about the rest of the Wildcats' season, Leber said.

"Any type of loss is a tough one to take, especially with the aspirations that we had at the beginning of the season," he said. "But those aspirations are still there — the goal is still there. There's always a possibility that if we just keep winning out and we can keep doing the things that we need to do — we can still be right there."

making plays, for keeping cool and poised, and winning and being a part of a program that has been down a little bit, and has helped them come back and start taking steps in the right direction.

Heupel racked up huge numbers against K-State, but more importantly, he made big plays when he had to, especially in the fourth quarter. K-State had pulled to within one touchdown and the defensive momentum shifted to the Cats.

Heupel killed that momentum, however, by connecting with four different wide receivers to drive down the field and eat up precious minutes off the clock, Oklahoma head coach Bob Stoops said.

"Josh Heupel getting them the ball in those situations just tells you what a winner he is, and how he finds a way to make a play when one isn't there," he said.

Perhaps even more frustrating for K-State was that Heupel was making those passes while getting chased, or tackled, by blitzing linebackers, K-State head coach Bill Snyder said.

"He's pretty good. He threw the ball off his back sometimes. I told our football team before the ball game that you can't complete passes on your back," Snyder said, "but he made me wrong."

Heupel's ability to make the plays was a combination, though, of pure athletic talent and his ability to take advantage of the situation. On Saturday, K-State blitzed on almost every play and, as a result, Heupel was able to throw the ball to the areas left open, he said.

"When we were throwing underneath, they were blitzing the house. So you're playing a game of, 'We're going to get you before you get rid of the ball,'" Heupel said. "You just take what they give you and hope for the best."

Mangino was more direct about Heupel's ability to beat K-State's blitzing defense.

"They blitzed us on every down. You can't do that to us. Josh and our receivers and our tight ends and running backs, they'll hurt you if you do that to us. You have to mix it up a little bit against us, and they just brought pressure constantly. Eventually, we'll find a way to get the ball downfield."

K-State cornerback Dyshod Carter agreed.

"He completed passes he had to complete. We didn't do a good job getting them three-and-out," Carter said, "and if you don't get Oklahoma three-and-out, then Heupel and the receivers, they can get you."

BADLY DRAWN BOY
The Hour of Bewilderbeast, Beggars Banquet
by Steve Lichtenstein
It's a crime that Badly Drawn Boy's debut LP won Britain's prestigious Mercury Prize last month – they should've given him two. The Hour of Bewilderbeast (bizarre title aside) is a blisteringly fine example of mature, well-crafted modern pop, toeing the line defined by The Beatles and eschewed by the likes of Beck and Belle and Sebastian. Tunes like the jaunty "Once Around the Block" and fragile "Fall in a River" (scenic imagery abounds here) are irresistible, and of the eighteen total songs, not one is even remotely unappealing.
GPA: 3.8 (Out of 4)

6GIG
Tincan Experiment, Ultimatum Music
by Dan Morrell
The recipe for 6Gig's debut, Tincan Experiment, includes pounding guitar work, thick drums, smooth bass, and passionate (albeit nasal and whiney) vocals. The quartet juxtaposes its introspective lyrics with raging six string gymnastics and thrashing drums, producing a sound ranging from the gritty metal feel of "Method," to the punk arrangement of "Junk, Puppet, Paperclip." Tincan Experiment even includes beautiful love ballads, like "Willie," which is backed by an orchestra of strings. The real experiment 6Gig is attempting here is whether or not their blistering sonic attack can maintain harmonic quality. Perhaps you should try this one at home. GPA: 3.1 (Out of 4)

Searching for 'Souls'

Lackluster film proves to be loss of hard-earned cash

Review by CORBIN H. CRABLE
Kansas State Collegian

COURTESY PHOTO

I was so psyched about "Lost Souls." Whenever I saw the trailer, I gasped with delight and anxiously awaited the movie with the eerie tag line, "On October 13, evil becomes you."

And then Friday the 13th rolled around, and the movie opened. My delightful gasps turned to agonizing moans.

In "Lost Souls," Winona Ryder portrays Maya Larkin, a woman with a dark past who assists the Catholic Church in performing exorcisms. On the other end of the scale is Peter Kelson (Ben Chaplin), a bestselling author whose journeys into the minds of serial killers have given him national fame.

Although Kelson believes evil and demonic possession do not exist, Maya is convinced that he is the man who will fulfill a horrifying prophecy: that Satan will inhabit the body of a man and unleash evil upon the world.

According to Scripture, Satan will inhabit the body of a man upon his 33rd birthday. And yes, you guessed it ... Kelson's birthday is in a matter of hours.

Scattered throughout the movie are hallucinations and flashbacks from Maya's past. She became involved in the Catholic Church only after she herself survived an exorcism, and one of the most interesting aspects of the movie is that Maya's past and the events of the present are linked together.

"Lost Souls" is reminiscent of "Stigmata" in the way that the most unlikely subject, a nonbeliever of good and evil, falls victim. As is the case with many religious horror movies, the "atheist" is victim of evil, and the religious zealot is there to provide guidance and assistance. The first time this was done, I'm sure it was a hit. But this type of plot has been overdone too often.

The lack of color in this movie, however, added much-needed eeriness. Everything is a drab shade of gray, and color seemed to be all but absent, a la Tim Burton.

"Lost Souls," then, is simply another addition to the growing popularity of religious horror movies. In a genre that needs fresh ideas, this will be another movie that is forgotten.

The plot is predictable, and Ryder, even though she has been typecast as the "spooky, supernatural-esque" woman since she appeared in "Beetlejuice" 12 years ago, plays a character who isn't at all convincing. Meanwhile, Chaplin's performance was, at best, decent.

If you're looking for a truly scary movie, you're looking in the wrong place. Pass this one right up and see "The Exorcist." At least you know you're getting your money's worth.

Game's hockey so realistic, your nose will bleed

Review by KEN WELLS
Kansas State Collegian

OK, let's forget football, it's hockey season now.

EA Sports' NHL series has long been the standard-bearer for PC hockey, and this year is another improvement. However, this year, the game just feels like hockey.

Among the additions for the 2001 version is "momentum" — not the raw velocity-times-mass equation, but the psychological effect of body checks, shots on goal and other non-scoring actions. When the momentum bar peaks, a fantastic play is usually not far away.

At the same time, EA Sports has added more customizability to game play, allowing the player to tweak game speed, puck friction, shot accuracy, fall recovery and several other factors. Each user's distinct taste in hockey can be met. This is not only an overdue and welcome addition, but other sports games should seriously look into including it. It makes the game impressively more playable and replayable.

Rink action benefits from impressive (if limited) motion-capture sequences. Watch players jostle for positioning before the face-off or throw the water bottle in disgust from inside the penalty box.

The "face-in-the-game" feature from last year remains, and it's still something of a chore to get good results. Using an off-kilter photograph (face tilted or shaded) can mean utter disaster or a post-car-accident face on your star forward. This is one area which could use a little more user-tweakness — the lack of flexibility makes it hard to get good results.

Using EA Sports' "ditty importer," a player can translate MP3 files into files "NHL 2001" can play during in-game sequences. If you want to play hockey to the strains of Liz Phair or Tori Amos, go right ahead. You can also import logos for custom teams and use them on their jerseys. These are small touches, granted, but they build on an already strong product and make it feel much more comfortable.

However, I wish the list of custom-team cities was longer and included fewer teams from Oklahoma, and that career play with custom teams was possible. Career play is only possible with established NHL franchises.

Fortunately, it's an expansion year, and if you want to take your own team into a season, you can depopulate either the Minnesota Wild or Columbus Blue Jackets (my preference) and stock it with your custom-built players.

Something that bears mentioning, apart from the actual game, is EA Sports' technical support. After having trouble using the game, I sent two notices to technical support, one via simple e-mail, another using its built-in diagnostic tool. More than two weeks later, I have not received a reply. (I got it up and running thanks to a Web site's help and not EA Sports' assistance.) This, coupled with the resultant problems from "Madden 2001" (which has developed several glaring game play bugs after patching for preexisting bugs), give me no confidence in EA's customer support in fixing any flaws in this game.

Fortunately, there aren't that many to begin with.

Despite my trepidation toward EA Sports, "NHL 2001" is too much fun to put down. The play-by-play is great, the player customization is versatile and diverse (but still no female support, even in the post-Manon Rheaume era?), and the difficulty can be adjusted for clueless newbies to second-Bobby Orrs alike.

Give it a shot — you might be surprised.

Cherry Poppin' Daddies' latest release doesn't swing music review

"Soul Caddy"
By: Cherry Poppin' Daddies

Review by KRISTEN DYMACEK
Kansas State Collegian

I had to look twice to see if I had picked up the right CD.

Unfortunately, I had.

The Cherry Poppin' Daddies latest release, "Soul Caddy," fails to duplicate the musical performance found in the band's previous albums.

With songs sounding like they were written for bad 1970s sitcoms, Cherry Poppin' Daddies falls short in producing the same harddriving, swinging songs achieved in its 1997 breakthrough album, "Zoot Suit Riot."

Of the CD's 13 tracks, only one, possibly two, have the familiar Cherry Poppin' Daddies sound — a mix of swing, ska and jazz spiked with a little punk.

The rest of the tracks leave listeners wondering if this is the same band that produced favorites such as "Zoot Suit Riot," "Drunk Daddy" and "Shake Your Lovemaker."

New songs, including "Grand Mal," "End of The Night" and "Saddest Thing I Know," sound like a pathetic cross of cheesy disco and lounge lizard tunes.

By far, the best track on the album is "So Long Toots." It has the foot-tapping, big-brass band sound that is needed (and was expected) on the rest of the CD.

I hope Cherry Poppin' Daddies falls back on older, more popular songs during its "Soul Caddy" tour because this CD doesn't give frontman Steve Perry any reason to gyrate his hips as before.

Perry, who wrote the lyrics and music for the album, needs to go back to the drawing board or at least find the inspiration he had for the last albums.

It's almost as if Perry knew "Soul Caddy" wasn't going to be any good because he named one of the tracks "My Mistake."

It sure was, buddy. Don't do it again.

Salina student spends summer as pilot in Alaska

By NANCY HULL
Kansas State Collegian

The adventure and challenge of an Alaskan bush pilot's life is something Aaron Alexander always wanted.

By last spring, Alexander, senior in aeronautical technology professional pilot option at K-State-Salina, said he had given up on the opportunity to fly in Alaska for the summer and planned to stay in Salina as a flight instructor.

After a few pilot jobs in Alaska fell through, Alexander finally landed a summer pilot job in Alaska in May.

The owner of Alaskan Air Service, a charter company, passed through Salina to refuel his aircraft and mentioned the possibility of summer jobs for student pilots.

Alexander sent the company his résumé, had a couple phone interviews, was hired on a Wednesday and was in Kodiak by the following Monday.

"It all happened so quickly," Alexander said. "All of the sudden I was walking down the jet way, and I thought 'Wow, I'm actually going to Alaska'."

Working for Island Air on Kodiak island required delivering groceries, mail, fuel, fishing supplies and people to the six villages on the island by flying a Piper Cherokee Six, a single-engine aircraft. During Alexander's 10-week stay, he was on duty 14 hours a day. Seven other pilots joined Alexander in serving the 15,000 residents on the island.

Living in Kodiak made Alexander realize the differences between our way of life and the people on the island.

"They really needed our planes and depended on the scheduled airline," he said.

Dealing with changing weather conditions, winds around the mountains and gravel runways were Alexander's greatest challenges.

Alexander had to adjust to using visual flight rules instead of instrument flight rules because of the mountains and changing weather.

"All the stories you hear about bush pilots are real. You're flying back in secluded islands and there aren't any roads," Alexander said.

Bob Stanford, director of operations at Island Air, said the training Alexander received at K-State-Salina was beneficial and Salina's pilot program fits the company's need for pilots.

"Aaron went through training rapidly and did a wonderful job," Stanford said.

He said Alexander's experience in Kodiak was a good stepping stone for him.

"Anyone who flies Kodiak will improve. Everything's so fast-paced and there's no time to think. Decision-making skills become much sharper," Stanford said. "He also had the experience of seeing country that he's not able to view in his part of the world."

Alexander said he had flown outside of Kansas a few times, but Kodiak was his first time in the mountains. Snow on mountain tops, green hills, pure blue oceans, glaciers and the variety of wildlife in Kodiak are things Alexander said he now misses seeing on a daily basis.

"I didn't have a lot of time to go see the sites, but I had a good tour of the island everyday when I worked," Alexander said.

While he enjoyed his time in Kodiak, he said he was looking forward to coming home.

"I was so excited to get out of Kansas, so I couldn't believe that I missed home so much," Alexander said.

After graduation in May, Alexander will return to Island Air in Kodiak as a pilot for a 15-month program.

Returning to Kodiak in the summer will give Alexander a chance to see the friends he made during his time there.

Jerry and Candi Scudero flew for Island Air with Alexander this summer, and the couple said they are excited for his return.

"We became close with Aaron pretty quickly," Candi Scudero said. "He's definitely a pilot. He just really likes to fly."

Alexander said eventually his goal is to fly corporate for business jets.

"He's a real personable and nice young man," Scudero said. "He'll go a long way in whatever he does."

game against the University of North Texas, covers ICAT, general admission and reserved student tickets.

The policy has indirectly created a new problem for K-State Police.

One reason is that the policy requires any valid K-State ID to enter the game, not one that matches the person coming in with it, Sgt. Troy Lane said.

Student tickets in the hands of non-students aren't the biggest concern, since no local law exists against reselling tickets, Lane said.

The real problem, he said, is using another person's ID card with it. That enters the territory of dealing in false identification, a Class E felony, Lane said. Loaning out an ID card might be interpreted differently by a judge, but selling the card is more difficult to defend.

"When you sell it, you're clearly violating Kansas law," Lane said. "It's a relatively minor felony, but it is a felony."

Of course, the success of the K-State football team creates a market. Lane said the two students trying to sell a pair of K-State vs. Nebraska tickets, each with an ID, on eBay had a starting bid of $1,200.

"Obviously there's a demand," Lane said.

At this point, the campus police will decide whether to press charges against the two students, he said.

The practice also is against university policy. Don Becker, manager of University card services, said the ticket policy was designed to protect students paying privilege fees.

According to the Student Life Handbook, card services are not transferable to other individuals. It also states that falsifying, altering or using the card without authorization opens the person up to disciplinary action and/or prosecution plus a $20 misuse fee.

Besides that, Becker said, a student is loaning or selling someone a card that has access to any Union Debit Account, or Commerce Bank account they establish. The card also has the student ID number, which is usually the same as his or her Social Security Number, Becker said.

"It really is not wise to sell anything with your Social Security Number on it," he said.

will make the line-up candidate for future Homecoming schedules.

"If Wildcat Request Live proves to be successful, I see it becoming a part of the Homecoming traditions,"he said.

Homecoming also includes several more activities throughout the week.

Crazy Cat Kickoff will be offered by the residence halls at 6:30 tonight on the front lawn of Goodnow Hall. Sponsored by the Kansas State University Association of Residence Halls, Crazy Cat Kickoff is a series of comical games, with teams of five men and five women.

Other traditional events include the KSU Ambassador elections, Pant the Chant, Purple Pride Day, a parade, pep rally and bonfire — not to mention the football and volleyball games.

The ambassador elections will take place on Wednesday, and all students are encouraged to vote. Two ambassadors represent the student body at KSU Alumni Association events for a one-year term.

Pant the Chant is Wednesday evening and gives groups an opportunity to present their spirit and enthusiasm through creativity.

The event also spotlights the cheerleaders, Classy Cats and the football captains.

This year's Homecoming Parade theme is "Year of the Wildcat" and will feature the K-State Marching Band.

"We are performing the same show as last year," Natalie Norris, sophomore in business administration and band member, said. "It's fun.

"Everyone's excited and cheering. The crowd has a good time and joins in with our enthusiasm."

The parade begins at 4:30 p.m. on Friday with the 50-60 entries, the largest number of entries the parade has ever seen.

The parade entries will be judged on creativity, overall enthusiasm, member participation and generation of Wildcat spirit.

moving, and the United States is getting a lot of people in there.

Among the names mentioned in the wake of the bombing is Osama bin Laden. The United States accuses bin Laden of organizing a network with followers across the Mideast, including Yemen, and says he masterminded the 1998 bombings of U.S. embassies in East Africa that killed 224 people.

Clinton, in a letter Saturday to Republican congressional leaders, said more than 100 military personnel, plus two Navy warships, were sent to Yemen to help with security, communications and medical needs.

Berger said the Defense Department is investigating whether future ships will continue to refuel in the area.

"We need to wait for a very thorough review and determine if anything more could have been done and should have been done," he said.

Aden's convenient deep-water port had been used as a refueling point for U.S. warships for about two years.

Missouri governor feared dead in crash

By JIM SALTER
The Associated Press

GOLDMAN, Mo. — A plane believed to be carrying Missouri Gov. Mel Carnahan crashed about 25 miles south of St. Louis on Monday night, the Jefferson County Sheriff's Department said.

"We believe that it may be the governor's plane," said Sgt. Ed Kemp, of the department. "We're still searching."

Earlier in the evening, Jerry Nachtigal, the governor's spokesman in Jefferson City, refused to comment on televised reports that Carnahan was on the plane.

"A plane has crashed in Jefferson County, and that's all we know," Nachtigal said.

Missouri Highway Patrol Sgt. Tim McDonald said a plane crashed in a hilly wooded area and that debris from the crash was scattered, making identification of the plane difficult.

McDonald said the governor's security staff was on site because they had not heard from Carnahan, and tensions were high in fear that it was the governor's plane.

The plane went down about 7:30 p.m. in an area near Goldman in Jefferson County. The area is thick with trees, scattered farmhouses and fields.

"We found wreckage in very small pieces spread over a large area. We have found some remains we cannot identify at this point," Kemp said. He said it was unclear if the remains were those of one or more people.

Carnahan, who is completing his second term as governor, won the Democratic nomination for U.S. Senate in August and has been engaged in a heated battle with Sen. John Ashcroft, R-Mo., a race considered one of the top in the nation.

According to Carnahan's travel schedule, the governor was traveling to Parks Bi-State Airport in Illinois across the river from St. Louis. He was to leave from there and head to New Madrid County Memorial Airport to attend a southeast Missouri Democratic minority coalition rally at 8 p.m.

Missouri Gov. Mel Carnahan signs a bill in June. Carnahan is believed dead in a recent plane crash near St. Louis.

Indiana man faces sex-crime charges

By CRISTINA JANNEY
Kansas State Collegian

A man who fled Indiana after allegedly raping a 14-year-old girl is being kept in Riley County Jail on $1 million bond after he was arrested by K-State Police on Sunday.

James Gilman, 41, of Elwood, Ind., is charged with various sex crimes, including rape at knifepoint, confinement and intimidation, said Bryan Williams, Madison County, Ind., chief deputy prosecutor. Gilman could face up to 100 years in prison if convicted on all counts, Williams said.

"These are major charges," Williams said. "It shows how desperate he was to get out of here."

Gilman allegedly restrained his victim with shoe strings, duct tape and handcuffs over an encounter that possibly lasted a few hours, Williams said. The incident happened Oct. 11.

Gilman was driving on campus Sunday evening when a campus police officer thought he was acting suspicious, Capt. Robert Mellgren, campus police, said.

The officer ran the car's tag, then did a check of the owner's name. A warrant out of Elwood, Ind., came up, and the officer pulled Gilman over and arrested him, Mellgren said.

Williams said Gilman will face extradition to Indiana. The Madison County prosecutor's office will request a governor's warrant that will be delivered to Kansas.

Gilman can waive extradition and go back to face the charges or fight his charges. If he fights, there will be a hearing. Williams said most suspects waive extradition or lose their extradition hearings.

Williams said if Gilman fights the extradition, he likely will remain in Kansas a few days before he can be returned to Indiana.

The extradition process usually takes about 30 days.

Investigation continues after explosion of ship

By BRIAN MURPHY
The Associated Press

ADEN, Yemen — Yemeni security forces on Monday interrogated dozens of port workers and others — including the head of the company that services U.S. warships — as divers struggled to retrieve more bodies from the mangled USS Cole wreckage where 17 Americans died last week.

The chief of the U.S. Central Command, Gen. Tommy Franks, toured the listing destroyer Monday to offer support to the crew, exhausted after battling all weekend to keep their badly damaged ship from sinking. In the United States, 13 injured sailors were released from a Virginia hospital by Monday afternoon, and more were expected to follow.

But in Aden, the port city where apparent suicide bombers attacked the Cole on Thursday, the focus was on identifying those behind the blast.

Ahmed al-Mansoob, general manager of the Al-Mansoob Commercial Group that provides food, supplies and garbage pickup to the U.S. warships, was released Monday after two days of questioning. The two crew members of the garbage barge assigned to the Cole also were brought in and later freed.

Al-Mansoob would not speak to reporters. But Abdullah Al-Khalaqi, marketing director for the Yemeni company, denied any connection to the attack last week that killed 17 American sailors.

Several people remained in a highly guarded camp on Aden's outskirts, but it was unclear whether they were considered suspects in the explosion that tore a 40-by-40-foot hole in the destroyer.

Yemen now considers the blast a premeditated criminal act, according to City transportation plans still under way

By LYNNE HERMANSEN
Kansas State Collegian

Plans to implement a campus- or citywide transit system in Manhattan are still in the works.

WORCESTER

"It hasn't been forgotten," Student Body President Jake Worcester said. "We are currently working with the city on a possible joint transit system."

A transit committee composed of 18 people named by the City Commission is working with a trans-system consulting group from Kansas City, Mo. The committee was formed based on recommendation and need. As part of the process, a study is being conducted and will be completed in March.

"We don't want to jump the gun if the city wants to implement a transit system," Worcester said.

The idea for a city transit system is an outgrowth of a transportation feasibility analysis for the past two years. The Kansas Department of Transportation agreed to fund 80 percent for an additional study.

"K-State's past student president, Jason Heinrich, got it all rolling with the shuttle system proposal," said Karen Davis, director of community development.

The study for a citywide transportation system will solicit feedback from the community through written and telephone surveys. The results will then be analyzed and shared at two public open houses. The first open house will take place at 2 p.m. Nov. 2 at the K-State Student Union, and the second at 5:30 p.m. Nov. 2 at City Hall.

K-State students and community members are encouraged to attend and give feedback.

"The systems recommended will be shared, and we will be taking citizens input," Davis said. "From there we will try to develop a feasible plan."

Parking Services became involved with the city transportation study because of growing campus parking and transportation concerns, said Darwin Abbott, director of Parking Services.

"There is no area as small as K-State's campus that has the kind of large number draws as K-State does," he said.

Abbott said K-State's transportation needs might be different than the city's needs.

"We will want to run short trips for the students, and I believe the city will want to run longer trips," he said. "I think the needs of the city and the university are going to be different. If the city can match the university's needs, that will be great, but I don' t think that it is likely."

Abbot said the system also will depend on how long students are willing to wait.

"Students may wait 10 minutes for a bus, but it's unlikely they will wait any longer," he said. "It is also unlikely that the city will be able to have enough buses to be running on a fixed amount system, such as every 10 minutes."

Costs for a transportation system are still up for debate and will not be settled until after the open houses and plans have been drawn together.

"No one has said a set cost, or decided how it will be funded," Davis said. "The options expand once we cross the 50,000 population mark, when this happens, we are eligible for transit funds from the state."

Davis said costs also depend on what community members are willing to accept.

"A transportation will not pay for itself, it all comes down to compromising with the community, K-State and the feasibility," she said.

Worcester said K-State is working as a partner with the city to share the costs and benefits in hopes of a better system.

"If the city transit system ends up not being feasible, then we will begin working on a campus shuttle system," he said.

Davis said having one transportation system will be more beneficial for the city, than two separate systems.

"Why should we have two, when we can have one by everyone working together," she said. "A joint effort can benefit the community and K-State, and we can stretch the dollars, share the costs and benefits of a citywide transportation system."

OPEN HOUSE

The first open house to discuss transit study results will take place at 2 p.m. at the Union, the second at 5:30 p.m. at City Hall, both on Nov. 2. K-State students are encouraged to attend.

Manhattan has looked at the transportation system in Ames, Iowa, and seen its success, Davis said.

"Eighty-five percent of the riders in Ames are students and faculty at Iowa State. They pay $20 per semester for transportation access, and it's proven successful," she said.

Worcester said that if a citywide system ceases to be implemented, the plan is to have a campus shuttle system by next fall.

"The campus shuttle system is still a commitment, but hopefully we will end up sharing a system with the city," Worcester said.

Forum provides chance to learn about candidates

By NANCY FOSTER
Kansas State Collegian

Classified Senate sponsored a forum Monday afternoon with the intent of giving classified employees the opportunity to voice their concerns to current state officers and their opponents.

Thirty-five current officers and candidates were invited to Legislative Day, and seven accepted an invitation to participate in a forum discussion for classified employees.

Classified employees include positions that don't always require a college degree, such as library assistants, custodians and receptionists.

Taking advantage of the opportunity, Susan Mitchell, library assistant II, voiced her opinion on health care benefits after retirement to State Rep. Jeff Peterson, R-Kan.

"I wanted him to know what our position is," she said, "and what our people that will retire in around five to 10 years will be paying."

She said she received a letter from an insurance commissioner asking her to voice the concern at the forum. Mitchell compared K-State's health care premiums to other peer universities and presented Peterson with the information. She said those who retire from K-State pay a high price for insurance, and wanted the Legislature to consider the idea of paying half — if not all — of health care insurance after retirement.

Women's basketball star suffers from ankle injury

Women's basketball freshman Laurie Koehn is in a wheelchair with a cast on her right ankle, K-State Sports Information Assistant Michele Dubert confirmed Monday.

However, Dubert said women's basketball, just like football, is unable to comment on the matter.

Koehn, a 5-foot-8-inch guard from Hestor, Kan., was named to the first team Women's Basketball News Service's Preseason College All-Freshman Team in late September.

She also was named a top incoming college freshman in the Athlon Sports College Basketball preview edition, one of five Big 12 women on the list.

In addition, Koehn was USA Basketball's third leading scorer on the 2000 gold medal-winning Women's Junior World Championship qualifying team this past summer after averaging 37 points, 5.9 rebounds, 3.4 assists and 5.2 steals as a senior at Moundridge (Kan.) High School.

Presidential election poll to take place on campus

Results of the presidential elections will be decided by a vote of pennies today at the K-State Student Union.

The Political Science Club and K-State's College Republicans will sponsor a "Penny Poll" by the Union Food Court from 10 a.m. to 2 p.m. Students will be able to put a penny in the jar that represents their choice of presidential candidate and in return receive a piece of candy or gum.

Sean McGivern, sophomore in French and political science, is a member of College Republicans and Treasurer of the Political Science Club.

"The results are by no means scientific, but we thought it would be an interesting way to predict how students are going to vote in November," he said.

McGivern said the polls are taking place for a number of reasons.

"The first is because we want people to vote, and a penny poll gets them to think about the candidates and issues," he said. "Secondly, we thought it would be a fun way to gauge which way the students will be voting."

In addition to this week's Penny Polls, College Republicans and the Political Science Club are involved in a number of activities throughout the year.

College Republicans also has sponsored a voter registration drive this fall, and during the week of Oct. 30 to Nov. 3, the organization will distribute informational handouts covering U.S. political issues such as poverty and national defense.

Kansas toll collector killed Monday in truck accident

WELLINGTON, Kan. — A tractor-trailer drove over a pickup truck before ramming into a south-central Kansas toll booth Monday, killing the toll collector and seriously injuring four other people in nearby vehicles, officials said.

The accident occurred at the turnpike's southern terminal near Wellington, about 19 miles north of the Oklahoma border, said Lisa Callahan, spokeswoman for the Kansas Turnpike Authority.

One person was taken by helicopter with critical injuries to St. Francis hospital in Wichita, and three others were taken to a Sumner County hospital.

Investigators still are working to determine what happened, but the accident involved the southbound semi-truck, a pickup truck, two cars and a motorcycle. The toll plaza, which has six lanes, was extensively damaged.

"We have traffic moving at this point, but we are encouraging customers this afternoon, this evening and tomorrow to take alternative routes," Callahan said.

Kansas woman's parole to be under discussion

TOPEKA — People will have five opportunities in the next two weeks to tell the Kansas Parole Board whether they think Lorna Anderson should be eligible for parole.

It is the fourth time parole has been considered for Anderson, the former Emporia church secretary imprisoned for her role in the 1983 murders of her husband and the wife of former Lutheran pastor Thomas Bird.

The board will hear public comments Friday in Topeka, Monday in Kansas City, Oct. 24 in Pittsburg, Oct. 26 in Wichita and Oct. 27 in Garden City.

Anderson, an inmate at the Topeka Correctional Facility, was convicted of soliciting the first-degree murder of her husband, Martin, and Bird's wife, Sandra.

She received two consecutive sentences of five to 18 years and was sentenced to an additional 15 years to life after pleading guilty to second-degree murder in her husband's death.

Thomas Bird was convicted of first-degree murder in 1985 for the death of his wife and was sentenced to life in prison.

Workshop stresses need for internships

By JESSICA PITTS
Kansas State Collegian

Students unsure about how to prepare for the job market had some questions answered Monday night at "Real World, Life After K-State."

The workshop, sponsored by Career and Employment Services and the College of Arts and Sciences, focused on teaching students the skills they need to develop during their years at K-State to prepare themselves for their next step, whether it be the job market or graduate school, said Tim Henderson, assistant director of Career and Employment Services.

"We wanted to give students the opportunity to come learn from employers and graduate students in a casual, informal, but educational setting," Henderson said. "We hope they gain a perspective early on what they can do to help develop their future career."

The students chose three out of the five sessions to attend during the three-hour workshop. The sessions included résumé and interviewing tips, an employer panel, tips for obtaining internships and information about graduate school.

The internship panel, "Road Map to Success," featured four students who shared their internship experiences.

Aubrey Kershner, panelist and senior in theater and public relations, interned at the Barrington Stage Company in Great Barrington, Mass., this past summer.

"I was really fortunate to have this internship," she told the audience. "It makes you feel so much more confident when you go out and search for a job, because you know you can do it. You have the experience and you will be an asset to your future employer because of it."

Tracey Fraser, director of Career and Employment Services, said internships can also create connections within a job field.

"You may intern for someone who knows someone where you apply to work later," she said. "You can never start too early, and you can never have too many internships. Some may not even be related to your major directly, but you need to think about what you learned from them and apply it to your career search."

Donna Prentice, freshman in mass communications, said she felt relieved after some of the information she received at the internship session.

"I feel like I know where to go to get help now and I know that I can start looking for internships early in my college career," Prentice said.

"Before I had no idea. Now I feel a little more comfortable about how I need to prepare for my career."

Henderson said he saw a need for the program last spring and enlisted the help of the Arts and Sciences Ambassadors.

April Spence, president of Arts and Sciences Ambassadors and senior in chemistry, said the event was mainly a way to make sure underclassmen were on track when it came to the future.

"We are really good about dealing with seniors and upperclassmen, but there was definitely a need for this kind of program for underclassmen," Spence said. "This is the first time this has ever been done here at K-State, but I think students who attend will gain a lot from it."

Leaders discuss K-State, city issues

By NANCY HULL
Kansas State Collegian

Tuition, city rental inspections, public smoking and the future of K-State and Manhattan as enrollment and population increase were key issues addressed at Mortar Board Senior Honor Society's fourth annual administrative forum.

Five administrators from K-State and one from the city of Manhattan were on hand to answer students' questions from noon to 1 p.m. Monday in the Union Courtyard.

Joseph Pingenot, senior in physics and mathematics, went to the forum to ask the panel about his tuition concerns.

Pingenot said his question arose after taking courses in Germany, where he said he paid about $25 per credit hour compared to $60 per credit at K-State.

"It seems like here you can get an education if you have the money, and there it's if you're smart enough," Pingenot said to the panel. "I'll graduate with over $20,000 of debt from loans to pay for my education."

Student Body President Jake Worcester responded by saying K-State is working to meet financial aid needs.

"There is $3.5 million of unmet needs. Regents will ask legislation this summer to meet the need," he said.

Tuition should not increase more than inflation, Worcester said. If it does, he said student funding should keep up with it.

Sue Peterson, assistant to university President Jon Wefald, said the Legislature is listening to the students.

"This year they took some funding and put it into students' salaries and financial aids," Peterson said. She said the funding was in response to the recent tuition hike.

Students asked City Manager Ron Fehr questions about the city's proposed smoking ban in restaurants and bars and the status of housing inspections.

Fehr said the City Commission is forming a focus group to see if all parties involved support the ordinance.

EVAN SEMON/Collegian

Student Body President Jake Worcester responds to questions about key issues that affect K-State students at Mortar Board Senior Honor Society's fourth annual administrative forum from noon to 1 p.m. Monday in the Union Courtyard.

Rental inspections are an issue the city is focusing on, Fehr said.

Annual inspections are performed at buildings where four or more housing units are together.

"This year we're looking to approve an ordinance to approve mandatory rental inspections for places with four or less units," Fehr said.

A city transportation system might come to Manhattan within the next five years, Fehr said in response to what the city will do as enrollment increases. He said a recent study indicates Manhattan might have the 50,000 residents needed to make the city an entitlement community, which allows for federal funds.

"Right now, we don't have the finances to meet demands. We're excited to develop a community transit program that will also meet campus needs since parking will be effected by a shuttle."

Increasing enrollment might force Lafene Health Center to move facilities to Mercy Health Center on Sunset Avenue.

"We might have to move to have enough space to meet the needs of students," said Lannie Zweimiller, director of Lafene.

Mordean Taylor-Archer, associate provost of diversity, said increasing enrollment should not force all campus building projects to expand. She said distance education, evening classes and technology will increase as enrollment increases, so there shouldn't be much of a worry.

Taylor-Archer said the enrollment figures for students of color may not increase in fall 2001 due to the new admission standards.

"If they don't meet one of the four new admission requirements, recruitment in that area will become critical," she said.

The question and answer session addressed important issues, said Cassie Latta, leadership chairman for Mortar Board society and junior in animal science.

"It was nice to have issues that students have been reading about all semester explained to them," Latta said.

She said students who were walking through the Union and came and asked questions benefited from the forum.

"We have great administrators who are willing to answer questions, and we encouraged students to attend," Latta said.

Student input necessary on transit issues

There's no doubt about it — students need a transit system.

The question remains if it should be a campus or a citywide one.

It is important to pay attention to the needs of students who reside off campus. For instance, Westloop Shopping Center is completely across town from the east Dillons and Wal-Mart. Some students do not own vehicles and need access to shopping areas.

Another positive aspect of the transit system will help halt the complaining of students when it comes to the parking dilemma.

It is important for students and the residents of Manhattan to attend the first and second open houses Nov. 2 in the K-State Student Union. On that day, results will be shared from the feedback received through written and telephone surveys.

Students and residents need to be there not only to listen to these results, but also to give additional feedback. This is an excellent opportunity to show we care about what is going on in terms of creating a solution.

Student Senate has done an excellent job of trying to assist students who need the transit system. It is taking a step in the right direction in terms of solving some of the problems that have existed on our campus for a considerable amount of time.

Students need to take the initiative and let the 18 member transit committee know what they want and expect from the system.

Now is the time to speak up.

The trouble with trendy

Originality should not be measured solely by person's wardrobe

CLINT MUDRICK

I own a pair of khakis. Two of them, actually. My fashion sense limits the stylish clothing I own, but after grudgingly making trips to the mall with friends, I have ended up with "Abercrombie and Fitch" appearing both on my debit card statements and in my closet. I am, simply stated, a trendy idiot.

Earlier this year, K-State was picked as one of the trendiest schools in the nation. This distinction gave administrators a chance to have yet one more distinction (albeit it a flaky one) over the football fodder university in Lawrence. More annoyingly, it gave the cynics another item about which to rant.

What is trendiness? To more accurately figure that out, it might be better to define the opposite of trendiness, originality.

A person that one would classify as original would likely be freethinking, have strong opinions, not instantly follow the majority and so on. Having set this definition, let us examine contradictions.

The society we live in is not infinitely heterogeneous. Chances are, for every K-State student who dresses one way, several hundred more dress the same. Abercrombie clones are rampant, but, then again, so are people wearing T-shirts and jeans. So who are the sheep? More importantly, who has the right to label the other as such?

Clothing is a matter of preference. While I might have a strong conviction that Tommy Jeans are a waste of money, one as easily could tell me that the Zoot Suit I bought for three dollars at the Salvation Army was wasteful. The only universally accepted wardrobe is, and always has been, no wardrobe at all. Considering that nudity is not socially accepted (don't ask me why), it is petty and cynical to belittle another's clothing, be it because they spent too much or got the clothing free for filling out somebody else's name on a credit card application.

But what about those purely on the "alternative" tip? What about the punks, the goths, the mods, the cowboys, the gangstas and so on? Does the spiked hair, the white make-up or the wranglers make any of these people more original? Of course not; all these styles already have been done, and all are done now not so much as a means of expression as a search for an identity. In much the same way that "alternative" music used to be truly alternative before becoming the norm, all the above-mentioned trends are simply on the back burner and no less unoriginal than any other trend.

Most importantly, to measure originality on clothing is fickle and short-sighted. One who thinks a person's entire character can be judged by the flannel shirt he or she wears is missing a lot. Originality on its most basic level is rebellion. While refusing to wear Tommy is still rebellion in a superficial sense, true rebellion occurs within the mind.

VINCE JACOBSEN/Collegian

Perhaps I am waxing philosophical. Then again, perhaps I think it is ludicrous that one feels he or she has the right to label another based purely on their attire. My two years in college have taught me that dismissing people because they wear Tommy as opposed to Abercrombie, Wal-Mart as opposed to Half Price Store, black lipstick as opposed to ... well ... not black lipstick, and so on, is a great way to remain closed-minded and ignorant of differences.

A case study might help. I have three Abercrombie shirts. Thus, I must be a preppie whose mind revolves around nothing but fashion. Strangely, my favorite shirt — my gameday shirt — is a hideous purple button-down with stars and moons on it. This shirt would indicate I am a rebel, a "freethinker" to some. The reality is that I sit somewhere in the middle; when possible, I try to conform to fashion norms, while drawing the line at belt-shoe coordination or those stupid visors. But to catch me in either outfit would be to completely misread me. The same applies to 95 percent of the university.

I like Nelly and have been a Pomeroy fan since I moved up here. My musical tastes seem to fall in line with the typical trendy fan; I like a popular local band and the guy MTV has been hyping so hard. Then again, does this trendiness explain the eight Reel Big Fish concerts I've attended, my memorization of the Beastie Boys' "Paul Revere" or the Poison concert I saw two years ago? Again, instant dismissal fails miserably.

My favorite show is "Seinfeld," but I am equally comfortable quoting Shakespeare as I am Kramer. I am a Kansan born and bred, but have no clue what a combine is or what it does. And the list goes on.

I have nothing but respect for those who strive to be different. But one does not come across originality by mocking those not exactly like him or her. Such a tactic is closed-minded.

More importantly, given the huge number of people who love labeling others as trendy, wouldn't the labeling itself be (gasp) trendy?

Those with such hatred and cynicism seem unaware that they are practicing exactly the acts are they are criticizing. They are calling those unlike them trendy, followers, sheep. Then again, so is everybody else.

Suburbanites lack knowledge of western Kansas

ZAC COOK

On my way to Pillsbury Crossing my freshman year, I rode with a nice young lady. I looked forward to studying for finals, swinging in the tire swing and frolicking in the waterfall. Pillsbury just has that homey feeling, due in part to the dirt roads that converge there. We approached a stop sign and had to pull over on the shoulder so a road grader could pass. She froze. I thought maybe this was due to a heart attack, but she was only 19. Her lips moved slowly and I heard, "What was that? I've never seen one before."

Now I was the one having a heart attack. "Honestly," I wondered, "who has never seen a road grader?" Road graders are like sunflowers and dandelions to me, they've always been everywhere at home and they always will be. A road grader is a large, usually yellow, piece of machinery that has a blade to level dirt roads, for those who don't know. I wanted to ask, "Girl, where you from?" But I already knew she was from Johnson County. Was I surprised by her lack of dirt road knowledge?

Not really. I realize there are a lot of things that are inherently different between western Kansas and the metro areas of Sedgwick, Shawnee and Johnson counties. For the past two years, I have been trying to learn more about these strange metropolitan areas. I traveled to each, learned the major street intersections and finally got all the directional schools straightened out. I think I saw one road grader total, and that was for snow removal.

However, the suburbanites have not been so keen at expanding their cultural competency. When I meet someone from the aforementioned counties and tell them where I'm from, I don't like them asking, "Is that in Kansas?"

"Yes," I tell them, "it's three hours west of Wichita. Close to Liberal." If it's a good day, they might know where Liberal is, but usually then they actually think I am from Liberal. On a really bad day, they'll say, "The only thing I have heard of west of Wichita is Dodge City." Thank God for Boot Hill and Wyatt Earp.

I know I'm being extremely stereotypical, but I honestly believe 80 percent of suburbanites don't know much about the large western chunk of Kansas. Some of them even like the Dixie Chicks singing about "Wide Open Spaces," but readily will admit that they've never been west of the U.S. Highway 81 line where the nothingness begins. Nothingness is spectacular; you ought to try it sometime. Make like Kid Rock and head out west.

Here's a chance for suburbanite redemption: I will offer an extra credit quiz. I'd like to call this my cultural competency quiz for residents of suburbia.

Sharpen your No. 2 pencils, get out your IDs, and concentrate.

T/F: Manhattan is the beginning of western Kansas.

T/F: Rocky mountain oysters and Coors both come from Colorado.

T/F: Starched Wranglers, a pressed Brushpopper and clean boots are not business casual.

T/F: The Nebraska game is more important than the opening day of pheasant season.

T/F: Driving I-70 from Wichita/Kansas City/Topeka to Denver counts as getting to know western Kansas.

OK, class, time is up. All of the above are false, and if you had trouble answering any of these, come see me. You need counseling.

For your information, Manhattan is not the demarcation line for western Kansas. Salina can be considered the beginning, but only if you travel on to exciting places starting with Great Bend, Larned or Garden City.

Rocky mountain oysters are bull testicles, and they are darn tasty. Ask Bill Snyder; I'm sure he had some at the last Scott County Catbackers supper.

Clean cowboy attire is very business. A Brushpopper beats Abercrombie and Fitch shirts any day.

Should I sell my Nebraska ticket for $200 and enjoy some tasty pheasant for dinner? I'm inclined to say so.

As much as you would like to think that sleeping in the car on the way to Colorado to go skiing is visiting western Kansas, think again.

And if you ever do want to come see the other half on Kansas, give me a call. I'll leave the light on for you.

Zac is junior in political science. You can e-mail him at zac3480@ksu.edu.

K-State's spirit impressive; assault of OU group offensive

Editor,

I would like to say that I was impressed with the spirit that K-State students and fans showed Saturday at the football game between our schools. Other than the expected taunting and trash talking, the fans were classy.

But there is a downside. While trying to take down the big OU flag that they carry, one of the spirit groups from Oklahoma was assaulted by two students who attempted to steal the flag. The spirit group, the Oklahoma RUF/NEKS, was not trying to cause any problems by carrying the flag onto your field. They were just caught up in the excitement. I hope things like this do not happen in the future at our field as well as yours.

Good luck the rest of the season.

Homecoming week involves more than matching jackets

Editor,

In response to Joseph Hurla's column regarding Homecoming week, we feel Hurla has misrepresented the purpose and people included in Homecoming. In fact, Homecoming week is not only about Pant the Chant and matching jackets, but includes such community service activities as Paint in Purple, spirit building activities like Paint the 'Ville and, yes, Pant the Chant. While it is true that greeks comprise a large portion of Homecoming participants, others certainly are not limited from participating, and in fact, many do.

Every year residence halls and several other clubs and organizations collaborate amongst one another during this week to engage in some or all of the same competitions and activities as their greek counterparts. Although their budget might be somewhat smaller and their clothes not in unison, Homecoming is no less important to them than any other organization on campus.

Hurla also implied that only exclusive and otherwise useless competitions such as Pant the Chant are involved in the upcoming week. Although we believe that events such as these build camaraderie and school spirit, Hurla was way off base in this statement, failing to mention other activities involved, including community benefiting Paint in Purple. This activity allowed students to volunteer their team to benefit different organizations around town, such as Habitat for Humanity, Cats for Cans and Meadowlark Hills Retirement Community. So, Joe, if you want to tell the group of senior citizens who were visited by Paint it Purple participants that they are just a "blip in the semester schedule," be our guest.

Accounting classes expanding

By ERIN DEHN
Kansas State Collegian

Students enrolling in accounting classes seem to have found themselves dealing with an economics problem.

It's a matter of demand being higher than supply, Arts and Sciences Sen. Sean McGivern said.

The demand is the number of students trying to enroll in two popular courses, Accounting for Business Operations and Accounting for Investing and Financing. The supply is the limited sections available. Both classes fall in the general education category and are requirements for 23 different majors. The result: enrolling students face the uncertainty of wait lists.

"I don't think the problem is going to go away," said McGivern, sophomore in political science and French. "The question is making it more manageable."

Finley Graves, head of the Department of Accounting, said the accounting department made slight changes in the wait list procedures this year.

"We do try to respect the integrity of the wait list," Graves said.

The first procedure students need to take is to choose the reference number of the section they want and place their name on the wait list for that section at either the enrollment center or through KATS.

Graves advises students on the lists to check their K-State e-mail regularly. Students will be notified by campus e-mail if a seat becomes available.

The department reserves several seats in each section of the classes during enrollment. These seats are given first to seniors who must have the course to graduate but are unable to enroll during enrollment and secondly to accounting, finance, and construction science majors who must have the course to progress in their programs. Then, seats are assigned to those on the wait list as they become available.

"We don't have enough resources to accommodate everyone, but we were able to accommodate everyone on waiting lists except for 30 to 40 freshmen," Graves said. "Administration is trying to help in every way they can."

The department was able to open three additional sections this semester.

Nichole Cann, graduate student in accounting, said she faced the wait list her sophomore year.

"You hear the horror stories of people not being able to get in," she said, "but for me it wasn't a big deal."

Health fair draws medical students

By LYNNE HERMANSEN
Kansas State Collegian

Concerns about the medical profession might usually draw students to Lafene Health Center, but the K-State Student Union was the preferred site Monday.

The Health Professional School Fair, which took place from 10 a.m. to 3 p.m. in the Union Main Ballroom was an opportunity for students to receive information, obtain advice and meet important people in the medical field, said Lisa Mack, associate director of Admissions at the Baker University School of Nursing.

"If students are interested in the medical field, and they are not here, they are missing out on talking to key people," she said. "This is an opportunity for students to take great advantage of."

Dr. Judith Calhoun, division chair of the Newman Division of Nursing at Emporia State University, said many students study nursing due to the growing field.

"The specialities are represented here and backgrounds," she said. "This is a good opportunity to help students who are interested in a medical field but unsure of the direction they wish to take."

The fair was also an opportunity to help students taking medical-related classes.

"It helps students plan their pre-courses, and to make sure they are taking the right courses," said Dr. Jeremy Matchett, professor and associate dean at the University of Kansas.

Dr. Joan Felts, chairman of the Nursing Division at Newman University in Wichita, said attendance in the past has been higher.

"Even though numbers have been down this year, the students here have been really polite and hospitable," Felts said.

"The fair helps in providing a wealth of information for students."

Women's golf team discovers all work, little play in 1st home match of season

By NICK BRATKOVIC
Kansas State Collegian

Frustration was the word of choice throughout Monday's 36 holes at Colbert Hills Golf Course

"Nobody wants to win this tournament more than those five girls who went out there this morning — I know that," Knight said. "They did their best, but it wasn't our best day."

The weather was great, the Marilynn Smith/Sunflower Invitational had a decent field, but the No. 44 K-State women's golf team's performance, well, that was another story, head coach Kristi Knight said.

"As a whole, we didn't play very well," she said.

K-State finished the day in third place with a two-round total of 623. The Cats trail Missouri, who shot a 603, and Iowa State, who shot 611, giving the Cats something to build upon for today's final 18 holes, Knight said.

"We had a couple of good rounds, but to do well, you have to have more than just two good rounds," she said.

The play of junior Edie Murdoch, who shot two rounds of 76, sparked K-State to a two-stroke lead over fourth place Kansas.

It was a day, Murdoch said, in which she struggled on the greens.

"The greens were rolling a little fast," she said Monday. "I just think I need to trust myself out there a little bit more tomorrow. I had more three-putts than I normally do."

Another K-State golfer who had a difficult day on the greens was freshman Christine Boucher, who shot rounds of 77 and 82. She said it wasn't her driving or chipping that hurt her, but the putting.

"I hit a lot of greens, but just couldn't make any putts," Boucher said. "It's fun to have our own tournament, but it's hard to play well sometimes, because there is a lot of pressure out there.

"From myself, the team wanted to play well at home."

Murdoch agreed it was nice to see familiar faces in the crowd.

"Our family and friends are here, so it is kind of nice," she said.

The home field advantage, Knight said, is something that could have been a possible distraction, as the team has not previously held a home tournament. Now, Knight said K-State will look to rebound early this morning and improve on its current position.

"They can have a little bit of time this afternoon to work on some things," Knight said Monday, "a chance to get a little bit of confidence and come out tomorrow and finish strong."

Volleyball team looks to climb back into top 25 after victory

By MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

After dropping from the rankings for the first time in 28 consecutive weeks on Oct. 2, the K-State volleyball team could rejoin the top 25 today after a 3-2 victory over No. 22 Texas A&M on Saturday.

The Cats (13-4, 7-2) extended their winning streak to four games with the win, but to do so, had to fight an uphill battle, losing the first game 7-15 to the Aggies (11-5, 6-3).

That loss, the Cats' first at Ahearn Field House this season, was just the result of a slow start, setter Disney Bronnenberg said.

"I think they just put away the game better in the first one," the junior said, "and we were still getting into a little bit of a rhythm, figuring out what they were doing, figuring out what we were doing."

After gaining its rhythm in the first game, K-State won the second and third games 15-12 and 15-11, respectively.

When the Cats did figure out Texas A&M, they were surprised to find out that the Aggies' attack included a verbal aspect.

During the break between the second and third games, several A&M players taunted the K-State squad, outside hitter Liz Wegner said.

"After the second game, between the second and third set, when we were running downstairs, they were saying some things to us," she said. "I don't think that's very cool, and we beat them. So now they're regretting what they said. I think that's the ultimate revenge, just beating them."

Despite their trash-talking off the court, the Aggies were able to test K-State on the court defensively, using their team speed to chase down and dig lots of balls.

The Cats, however, were better, head coach Jim McLaughlin said.

"We won the defensive battle, and A&M is always very good at defense. They dig a lot of balls, and they play great team defense, but we did tonight," McLaughlin said. "I think we're the two fastest teams in the Big 12, but our systems allow us to play fast.

"They run a really nice system, both offense and defense, but so do we. We play a pretty fast game. We're faster than any other team in the country, I think."

K-State might have played faster and better defensively, but Texas A&M was still able to force a fifth game by winning game four 11-15.

The match depended on who would play well in the crunch, and several K-State players rose to the occasion.

Freshman middle blocker Lauren Goehring, for instance, was responsible for the last three points of the fifth game, hitting two and teaming up with junior Lisa Mimick to block one.

Goehring's partner in the middle, senior Kelle Branting, also had a big night, tying her career-high of 19 kills, while Wegner added another 29 kills on the outside.

"It was going to come down to who could score in transition, and I thought Liz got hot at the end of games," McLaughlin said, "and you know who did a good job and is not 100 percent, was Jenny Pollard. She put some balls away when we needed her. And then Lauren Goehring, at the end — a freshman — hits two of the biggest balls of her career. That's big."

While McLaughlin is happy with the team's play under pressure, the Cats still are not playing consistently, he said.

"I thought we were good when we had to be, but I sure would like to see us good in the beginning."

K-State's Liz Wegner dives for a ball Saturday night at Ahearn Field House during a game against Texas A&M. K-State won the match in five games.

volleyball notes

Home, sweet home
The Wildcats extended their home winning streak to a school-record 11 matches with the win over Texas A&M.

Aggie troubles
Texas A&M has never won in Ahearn Field House since the two schools began a home-and-home format with the inception of the Big 12 Conference in 1996 (0-5).

Wegner watch
Junior outside hitter Liz Wegner has compiled 63 kills in her last two matches.

Her 34 against Colorado Oct. 11 not only broke the school record for kills in a three-game match, but it snapped the Big 12 record of 33 held by Sonja Van Helden of Iowa State, also against Colorado on Oct. 5, 1996.

Wegner now owns the Big 12 records for kills in a three-game and four-game match (35 kills against Texas last season).

More on Wegner
Her 34 kills tied Anne Parisien of Syracuse for the eighth-most kills in a three-game match in NCAA history. The NCAA record of 40 is held by Catalina Suarez of the University of Missouri-Kansas City.

Setter skills
Junior setter Disney Bronnenberg equaled Wegner's big night against the Buffaloes last Wednesday by breaking the school record for assists in a three-game match with 62. The old record of 60 was held by all-time assists leader Devon Ryning on Sept. 7, 1996, against Oregon.

Senior success
Against the Buffaloes, senior middle blocker Kelle Branting became the 11th Wildcat and the second this season (Liz Wegner did it earlier this season against Virginia Tech) to eclipse the 1,000 career kill barrier.

Disenchanted world of Cat football retains hope despite pain of early-season loss

FRANK FLATON

I'd rather slide down a hot razor into a pool of alcohol than lose.

I'd rather watch 24 consecutive hours of Richard Simmons' "Sweatin' to the Oldies" than lose.

And I'd rather climb up Mount Everest in swimming trunks with a refrigerator on my back than lose.

Yeah, losing sucks — a lot. I'm positive that the K-State football team, not to mention the entire purple nation, feels the same way about the "Saturday from Hell" as I do about losing.

K-Staters were set on a national title this season. This was the year, right? Well, all those hopes and dreams seemed to fight when the Sooners walked into town and stripped the dignity away from the purple people.

There's no reason why the Wildcats and the fans shouldn't be upset about this. Unfortunately, in today's society, losing is looked down upon. Losers don't last too long.

There's no satisfaction in being the guy who lost to the president in the election — there's no happiness for second place — and as much as the Holiday Bowl representatives don't want to admit, there's no sense of well-being after getting a Holiday Bowl bid.

But there's still light at the end of the tunnel. If I was given a quarter for all the people who said, "Oh, there goes the season," I sure wouldn't be a Collegian columnist.

So as hard as it may be, keep your head up, take your head out of your Midori Sorrow and, most importantly, stay optimistic.

With that said, I will go out on a limb and say the Wildcats still have a shot, no, change that, a good chance of playing in the national championship game. You don't believe me, do you?

Just pay attention to the two most important rules in college football.

Rule No. 1: Nobody is safe. Anyone can lose to anyone.

Rule No. 2: If a team has to lose, it works to its favor to lose early. That way, the team has time to redeem itself later in the year. In this case, the Wildcats can lose early, beat Nebraska, beat Oklahoma again in the conference title game and have a chance for the prize.

If optimism is your goal, keep these important ideals in mind. Here are three likely scenarios in college football that can still put the Wildcats in the running for the prize of all prizes.

Note: all scenarios rely on the Wildcats beating Nebraska and then beating Oklahoma in the Big 12 Championship. It's no secret. The Cats have to be perfect here on out.

1. The "Anything is Better than the Alamo Bowl" Scenario: The Cats do what they need to do and earn a bid with Oklahoma in Kansas City. Assuming that Virginia Tech wins out and Clemson or Florida State grab the No. 2 bid, K-State will win the Big 12 Championship and grab a BCS bid in the Fiesta Bowl. That's a lot better than Holiday or the Alamo Bowl. A win in Tempe, Ariz., brings money, national esteem and another pretty trophy.

2. The "Hokie" Scenario: Everyone ahead of the Cats in the polls must lose in order for the Wildcats to grab a National Championship bid. First, Virginia Tech beats Miami to ensure a spot in the national championship. Then, Florida State has to beat Clemson but lose to Florida or NC State. Plus, Florida will lose to Georgia or in the SEC Championship game.

Stay with me here. If K-State has a strong showing against OU and the Huskers, this will jump them ahead of Clemson and put them in the game of all games against Virginia Tech. This might not be probable, but possible.

3. The "Everyone Gets Screwed" Scenario: Miami knocks off Virginia Tech, but Miami still has one loss. Clemson loses to Florida State. Florida State wins out again and knocks out Florida.

Since the Wildcats lost early in the year and win a Big 12 Championship, they will leap-frog Clemson, Florida and V. Tech. Miami and Florida State are left. With all those teams losing just once, nobody will be treated fairly.

But the Wildcats' schedule ranking will be strong then and could jump them into the title game against Florida State.

OK, take a deep breath and take some aspirin. As confusing as it might be, these scenarios are legitimate (remember rules one and two).

The point is simple. There's still a lot of football to be played — nobody is completely out of the picture.

So keep supporting the Cats and don't give up hope.

If all the stars are aligned properly, the Wildcats could be sitting on the beach in Miami.

Aggieville boutique promotes diversity, offers African hair styles, jewelry, decor

By CHELSEA SCHMIDT
Kansas State Collegian

From the outside, it looks like any other store in Aggieville.

Upon entering, the store transforms into an African paradise.

The Ethnique Boutique & Braids Parlor in Aggieville features figurines, jewelry and other cultural accessories from African countries ranging from and Uganda and Nigeria to Egypt. It also provides braiding and hair extension services.

"What I enjoy most is showing off the different things we have from Africa," Pauline Okot-Kotber, store owner, said. "People get excited and they like it."

Featuring ethnic items that promote cultural diversity, Okot-Kotber said her store brings in customers of all ethnic backgrounds and age groups.

The most popular service the store provides is hair-braiding and extensions, Okot-Kotber said. She said she encourages those students who don't want to have to do anything with their hair to come in and have it braided.

"Everybody doesn't want to do their hair every morning," she said. "It's a great service."

Sharee Grishom, junior in computer science at Southeast Missouri State University, said she drives all the way to Manhattan just to get her hair braided at the Ethnique Boutique & Braids Parlor.

"I just like the way they braid," Grishom said. "They are more consistent with their braids, and I'm very picky."

Grishom was introduced to the parlor last summer while visiting a friend in Junction City. She said the drive from Cape Girardeau to Manhattan is worth the time and effort.

"Once I find somebody I like, I stick with them," she said.

The prices for services at the store are reasonable and competitive, Okot-Kotber said.

"You can get your hair cut and styled for about $25, and you have to do it often," she said. "Imagine staying two to three months without having to do anything to your hair. It's really not as costly."

MATT STAMEY/Collegian

A wooden giraffe looks out the front window of the Ethnique Boutique & Braids Parlor. The giraffe is one of many cultural accessories featured at Ethnique Boutique. The store is across from 12th Street Pub in Aggieville.

Okot-Kotber said the prices for braiding services differ depending on the size of the braids and how long it takes to put them in. On average, the braiding costs $60 for the first five hours and $10 for every additional hour. For quick dues, such as a two-hour job, she charges $15 per hour.

However, Okot-Kotber said her store doesn't only feature braiding. It also provides cultural diversity for customers.

"As far as the things we have in front, we want everybody to have access to different things from different countries," she said.

She said there isn't a single item that seems to be the most popular. Instead, each customer chooses something different, but she has noticed that college students tend to like the jewelry the store carries.

Students with ethnic backgrounds at K-State said they like it when stores promote cultural diversity.

"I think it is very important because Manhattan is a typical town in the center of a rural area," Katy Ybarra, senior in dietetics, said.

"Multiculturalism and diversity is a big issue in classes. You are going to have to manage people of all backgrounds. If you have a heart for all kinds of people, you get to know all kinds of people."

MATT STAMEY/Collegian

A wall of pictures shows off some of Ethnique Boutique & Braids Parlor's favorite hair styles. The Ethnique Boutique has been open for almost three years.

Brice Basquez, senior in music performance, said he also likes it when shops promote cultural awareness.

"It helps crack some of the stereotypes there might be," Basquez said. "There is a predominantly white population especially in Kansas, and it is cool when awareness is promoted."

Okot-Kotber said the Ethnique Boutique & Braids Parlor plays a small roll in this awareness providing students and community members of Manhattan a taste of the African culture.

"We're hoping people get a little bit more open-minded," she said.

Cross country teams aim for strong finish

Sophomore Amy Mortimer leads the No. 5 Cats into the 2000 postseason.

By JASON ARY
Kansas State Collegian

With three championship meets in the next few months, the Wildcat cross country team is looking to improve on its performance at the Pre-NCAA meet in Ames, Iowa, this past weekend.

The fifth-ranked women's team finished 8th out of 56 teams, with All-American Amy Mortimer leading the way for the Wildcats, finishing 4th overall with a time of 21:00 on the newly extended 6,000-meter course.

Senior Korene Hinds, another All-American, was the only other Wildcat to crack the top 10, coming in 8th with a time of 21:15.

While Mortimer and Hinds fared well, the other five Wildcat runners finished farther behind in the pack, placing anywhere from 56th to 300th in the field of 371 runners.

"That's the thing about (cross country)," head coach Randy Cole said. "It's a total team sport, and you need everyone to contribute."

NEXT UP

The men's and women's cross country squads have a couple of weeks to hone their skills before traveling to Boulder, Colo., on Oct. 28 to compete in the Big 12 Championships.

The men's team struggled as a whole, Cole said, finishing 41st out of the 53 teams competing.

Senior Jean-Paul Niyongabo came in 22nd overall, while junior Shadrack Kimeli's 31:25 time on the 10,000-meter course was good enough to notch him 17th place.

Other than Niyongabo and Kimeli, no other Wildcat finished in the top 300.

"It's disappointing we didn't place higher," Cole said. "We still have some big gaps between our runners. With big races like this, improving your time by just 10 seconds can improve your standing by 20 places or so."

INVESTIGATION

SABA, the official Yemeni news agency, a reversal of an earlier position and a crucial boost to the investigation. Yemeni President Ali Abdullah Saleh's backing is vital for FBI agents and other U.S. terrorism experts to work closely with Yemeni authorities.

Saleh met with Franks to review military cooperation and evidence gathered by Yemeni security forces, SABA said.

"The president expressed his deep regret and sorrow for this criminal act against our country and against the United States of America," the agency added.

There has been no credible claim of responsibility for the deadliest terrorist attack on the U.S. military since the 1996 bombing of an Air Force barracks in Saudi Arabia that killed 19.

"We will track them down," Defense Secretary William Cohen said. "We owe that to the families."

Franks toured the Cole on Monday and spoke with the crew, which finally seemed to have gained the upper hand in keeping the warship afloat. Until dawn Sunday, they had continued to try to bail out a flooded bulkhead, with electrical shorts knocking out power. At one point, they jury-rigged a pumping system from port side fire fighting equipment.

By Monday, most flooding was contained and conditions on board improved.

"Heroic efforts were undertaken by the crew ... they saved the ship," said Rear Adm. Mark Fitzgerald, head of the U.S. task force at the ship.

Only five of the victims have been recovered. Divers searched water-filled compartments and crews with powerful metal cutters would try to slice through the wreckage to reach the others: two visible and the 10 still missing and perhaps trapped behind floors and walls wrenched apart by the blast.

The inability to quickly reach the bodies of the missing crew members showed the extreme difficulties facing underwater teams trying to thread through a maze of jagged wreckage and collapsed compartments in the murky, oil-filled harbor.

"The divers are working in a touch and feel kind of mode," Fitzgerald said. "So it's a slow process and that's the real problem. It's slow going."

In Germany, James Rundell, deputy director of the Landstuhl Regional Medical Center, said two badly injured victims will remain in a military hospital there for at least another week, while four sailors will likely return to the United States on Tuesday or Wednesday. Thirty-three other injured sailors returned to the United States over the weekend, and 13 were released from a Virginia hospital by Monday afternoon.

Thursday's explosion was so powerful it buckled the deck and turned the attack boat into confetti size bits, an official said.

Immediate suspicion fell on terrorist mastermind Osama bin Laden — accused in the 1998 bombings of U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania that killed 224 people.

FORUM

working, it's not a benefit," she said.

Peterson responded to Mitchell's concern by asking if she would be willing to speak with the Joint Committee on Pensions and Insurance regarding the issue.

Other issues discussed were on the Council of Classified Senators Position Paper. The paper is a conglomeration of concerns from each Kansas Board of Regent school's own position paper.

The fiscal year 2001 position paper addresses health care coverage and costs, supporting a bill that would allow holidays to be counted as timed worked, retirement health care insurance costs, and increasing classified workers' salaries.

"A lot of questions were answered," said Connie Kissee, classified senator representing Hale Library.

She said a main concern voiced from employees was salaries. Most legislators and opponents agreed they needed to be increased, but finding a way to get the money was the problem.

House Democratic candidate Dean Stramel suggested raising taxes in order be able to raise salaries.

Kissee said she didn't think that was the solution.

"It would not work because if you pay more taxes, you'll get more money, but you won't be seeing as much in your paycheck," she said.

"That would just take away from our salary to pay more taxes."

Many K-State painters attended to address how their positions are classified. As it currently stands, a painter who has worked for 20 years will have the same title as one who is on the first day of the job.

Cheryl Grice, classified senator representing administration and finance, said not only were the classified employees interested in voicing that opinion, but so were the incumbents and their opponents.

"We accomplished what we set out to do," she said.

She said people are encouraged to write or call legislators with their concerns, but for one reason or another, many people don't. The forum provided those with something to say the opportunity to do just that, Grice said.

"There needs to be communication between employees and legislature," Grice said. "It's just extremely convenient to invite them here to allow that opportunity."

Students discuss final presidential debate

PETE SOUZA/Chicago Tribune

Vice President Al Gore and Republican Presidential candidate Texas Governor George W. Bush talk to voters at the final presidential debate of the 2000 campaign. The debate was at Washington University in St. Louis, Missouri Tuesday.

By NANCY FOSTER
Kansas State Collegian

Gathered together in the "K" room of the K-State Student Union, more than 35 sat and listened to the third and final presidential debate.

Driven to attend Debate Watch by curiosity and extra credit for, Marc Voth, senior in agronomy, said his primary concerns was with two issues: education and gun control.

"My parents are in the school system," he said. "They're both teachers, and I'm an avid hunter."

Prior to the debate, Voth said his vote was in the hands of Texas Gov. George W. Bush. Not having seen the first two debates, he said his opinion was formed from what he had seen and heard on the news.

"I've heard discussion, and I've got a pretty strong stance already," Voth said.

After listening to the debate, and their discussion of the issues Voth was interested in, he said his stance was still firm.

"I'm still for Bush," he said. "He came across very genuine. I didn't get the feeling he was feeding me a line or just trying to please."

A vote was taken at the end of the debate to see which candidate people felt won the debate. Two voted for Bush, two for Al Gore and the rest abstained.

Voth felt Bush solidly won the debate. He said he only wished they would have discussed education and gun control more in detail.

Hearing more discussion regarding teachers' salaries would have been nice, he said.

"As for gun control, I feel like I just like the whole idea behind Bush. He seems to be more concerned with the people than the government in those views," Voth said.

Luke Willis, junior in secondary education, said his vote was for Vice President Al Gore.

"I think the debate kind of showed the personable sides of each candidate, and I think the persona of Gore wasn't that great," he said. "It doesn't make him a bad candidate, just a bad debater."

Willis said he felt Bush took control over the debate almost from the beginning.

"Every time Gore attacked him, he had a good, precise answer," Willis said. "He's not my candidate, but in terms of the debate, I think he won. Gore tried to start arguments."

Shanda Parker, senior in public relations, said before watching the debate her vote was with Gore.

Issues of main concern to her were gun control and campaign finance reform, Gore's view of which, she said, was non-partisan.

"I really respect his stance on both of these issues," she said.

She said these issues are of high priority, and the views behind them are what's driving her vote toward Gore.

Club-conducted poll indicates Bush lead

STEVEN DEARINGER/Collegian

Students were able to voice who they would vote for on Election Day on Tuesday in the K-State Student Union by dropping money into a cup for their candidate in exchange for a piece of candy. George W. Bush won with $4.13, Al Gore was in second with $1.50 and Ralph Nader was third with $1.21.

By JESSICA PITTS
Kansas State Collegian

An unscientific poll, that took place in the K-State Student Union on Tuesday, predicted Republican George W. Bush as the winner of the presidential election.

The poll, sponsored by the Political Science Club and K-State's College Republicans, allowed students to vote for their choice of presidential candidates with a penny and received a piece of candy in return.

Bush won the Penny Poll, raising $4.13, followed by Vice President Al Gore, Democrat, raising $1.50 and Ralph Nader, Green Party candidate, raising $1.21.

"The results were typically what we expected," said John Nelson, president of the Political Science Club and senior in political science. "Manhattan and Riley County are predominately Republican, so the poll was pretty consistent to those views, which is how we thought it would turn out."

However, Nelson said he was surprised about the amount of people who voted as independents.

"There was a lot more support for Nader than we expected," he said. "He seemed to have a better following than Gore did. Many of the voters said they supported him and his ideas. However, most of the voters we talked to already had their minds made up on which candidate they wanted elected — and that was Bush."

Ken Zook, graduate student in student affairs, is one such student.

"I am definitely voting for Bush," Zook said. "I don't like Al Gore's values. I tend to lean towards the more conservative side, especially on issues like abortion."

Nelson also said that some students were unsure of who they were going to vote for.

Laura Phillips, freshman in business finance, said she still doesn't know who she is going to vote for, but is leaning towards Bush right now.

"I really am undecided," she said. "I always try and do research on all the candidates before I vote, and I haven't had time yet. However, on first impressions alone, I am leaning towards Bush."

Nelson said the clubs sponsored the polls for a couple of reasons.

"Mainly we wanted to see how students were going to vote in the upcoming elections," he said. "Plus, the club is not doesn't do a whole lot of activities on campus, and we thought this was a fun way we could get involved."

In addition to the Penny Poll, College Republicans will distribute informational handouts covering U.S. political issues such as poverty and national defense during the week of Oct. 30 to Nov. 3.

Candidates clash on budget, health care, foreign policy

By WALTER R. MEARS
The Associated Press

ST. LOUIS — Vice President Al Gore attacked George W. Bush as an ally of the rich and powerful Tuesday night, but the Texas governor rebutted in climactic campaign debate that his rival was a "big spender" in the mold of Democratic liberals who once sought the White House and lost.

"He proposed more than Walter Mondale and Michael Dukakis combined," Bush said of two Democratic presidential candidates rejected by the voters in 1984 and 1988.

The Texas governor and the vice president, locked in a close race for the White House, argued domestic and foreign policy issues for 90 minutes in a town hall-style format, fielding questions from an audience of uncommitted voters. It was their third encounter in two weeks, and their last before they face judgment at the polls on Nov. 7.

In their final summations, the two men stripped their appeals to the essentials.

"I have kept my word," said Gore, who has served as Bill Clinton's vice president for two terms. He mentioned his service in Vietnam and a strong marriage of 30 years. He said the nation has experienced record prosperity and reduced crime in

Suspect wanted in attempted carjacking

By JENN DAVOREN
Kansas State Collegian

Two K-State students were victims of an attempted carjacking this weekend.

Michael Hensler, freshman in construction science and management, was driving Erin Hickey, freshman in elementary education, to her residence hall around 3 a.m. Saturday when his car was approached by a man with a gun.

Hensler said he had pulled into the small parking lot between Ford Hall and Haymaker Hall when he first noticed the subject.

"He was standing in the middle of the road, and Erin was yelling 'Don't hit that guy,'" Hensler said.

Hickey said she could see the man was holding a gun as he approached the right side of the Hensler's car.

"He ran to the driver's side and put a gun to my friend's head and said 'Give me your car,'" she said.

The suspect became nervous, however, when traffic began to back up behind the stopped vehicle, and ran away before his victims could respond, Hensler said.

"It all took less than 10 seconds," he said.

Hickey described the suspect as around 6-feet- 3-inches tall and weighing about 200 pounds, with brown hair, brown eyes and silver-framed glasses.

Sgt. Lynette Woods of the Riley County Police Department said no arrests have been made in the case, but the report has been turned over to investiga-

Missouri mourns death of state leader

By STEVE BRISENDINE
The Associated Press

Messages of shock and sympathy came from around the nation and across Missouri on Tuesday as the state mourned the death of Gov. Mel Carnahan.

Carnahan's son, Roger "Randy" Carnahan, and his senior campaign staffer, Chris Sifford, also died when their plane crashed Monday night in Jefferson County, about 25 miles south of St. Louis.

In the Carnahans' hometown of Rolla, Democratic activist Bob Jones was devastated by the deaths.

"For me, losing the governor and his son is like losing members of my family," Jones said. "Losing Chris Sifford is also a great loss."

State officials and journalists alike wept in the Capitol at Jefferson City, and everyone from Vice President Al Gore to hotel doormen remembered Carnahan as a down-to-earth, hard-working public servant whose death casts a shadow over the state's future.

"Mel addressed the challenges that Missouri's families face," Gore said in a statement. "He enacted far-reaching education reforms, was a national leader on health care and worked to make the state's streets and neighborhoods safer. More than this, Mel was a good friend."

Despite his political stature, many said, the governor never lost his common touch.

"He did a lot for Kansas City. This hurts everybody in town," said Paul Alexander, a doorman at the Westin Hotel in Kansas City's Crown Center. "He was always really down to earth."

Alexander and doorman Shahid Nazir both encountered Carnahan often as he attended official functions there.

"He always came, always shook hands — he was always so nice," Nazir said. "I never saw him unhappy. He always had a smile on his face. It was just such a shock when I heard this morning."

Deputies face suspension after shooting gas tanks

OVERBROOK, Kan. — The Osage County sheriff says two deputies probably used poor judgment when they fired high-powered rifles at propane tanks containing anhydrous ammonia last weekend.

Osage County deputies Saturday responded to a report of three abandoned tanks in a ditch along a rural road north of Overbrook. Sheriff Ken Lippert said the tanks, which had once contained propane, had been refilled with anhydrous ammonia.

Anhydrous ammonia, a colorless gas, is a fertilizer that also is used to produce the drug methamphetamine.

Lippert said the deputies knew the tanks contained anhydrous ammonia because some of the pungent gas was seeping out and the valves on the tank had corroded.

The sheriff said the deputies fired rifles at the tanks to render them useless.

The shooting alarmed residents, many of whom drove to the scene to see what was happening.

"What dummy would shoot into propane?" said a resident who didn't wish to be identified. "They're lucky there wasn't any propane left in there. If it had been, there'd be two dead deputies."

Lippert said a narcotics investigator in his department said a federal Drug Enforcement Administration agent informed him some time ago that shooting the tanks was an acceptable way to render the tanks useless.

But a DEA spokesman was taken aback Monday by that assertion.

"I just can't believe that one of our guys told him to do that," said Shirley Armstead, a DEA spokeswoman based in St. Louis. "That's beyond me."

25 dead as severe floods inundate Italy, Switzerland

PIACENZA, Italy — Italy hurried more than 15,000 people from the path of two raging rivers Tuesday as flood waters that wreaked death in Alpine towns bore down on the medieval villages and cities of the northern Italian plains.

The death toll in Italy and Switzerland rose to 25, with the mud-caked bodies of a 1-year-old Italian boy and a woman believed to be his mother among the latest uncovered. A total of 21 people in the two countries were missing and feared dead.

In both countries, authorities said overall damage would be in the hundreds of millions of dollars.

Flooding forced the Fiat auto giant to shut down two of its biggest plants in its hometown of Turin. Blocked roads and railways and inundated factories made it impossible for suppliers to deliver parts, spokesman Franco Sodano said.

Officials were thinking of opening upstream dikes to ease the threat to communities downstream, Public Works Minister Nerio Nesi said.

"We are in a state of anxiety, of high emergency," Nesi told reporters, adding, "The situation now could become very dangerous."

The floods and landslides started Saturday in southern Switzerland and northern Italy after days of pounding rain. Flood water roaring out of the Alps brought Lake Maggiore on the Swiss-Italian border to its highest level in 160 years.

Most of the deaths came over the weekend when mud, rock and water rushed through villages and towns, sweeping away stone houses

Outbreak of Ebola virus kills 37 so far in Uganda

GULU, Uganda — Dressed in surgical gowns, flimsy masks and knee-high rubber boots, the nurses at Locar Hospital know that with each day that passes they have a greater chance of becoming infected with the deadly Ebola virus.

One doctor and two nurses are among the 37 who have died so far from the terrifying hemorraghic fever that can be passed through a simple handshake — including two more victims who died Tuesday. And with 10 more suspected cases identified each day, their work load will only increase.

"Most of us are so afraid," said nurse Peter Otim, peering anxiously from behind a thin mask that hid all but his eyes. "It is so challenging because we are so few and there is so much work to be done."

There is no blood test for Ebola, and a case can only be confirmed through sophisticated blood analysis requiring special equipment not available in Uganda. Health workers have begun quarantining anyone complaining of flu-like symptoms, diarrhea or vomiting, the earliest signs of exposure. Some 90 percent of confirmed Ebola victims die.

Ebola is spread through contact with bodily fluids, including saliva, blood and mucus, though it is not spread through the air. It is feared for its devastating speed and painful death. Four days after exposure, flu-like symptoms set in, followed by bloody diarrhea and vomiting. Ten to 15 days later, the victims "bleed out" through the nose, mouth and eyes. Blood and other bodily fluids also begin seeping through the skin, producing painful blisters.

Improving advising goal of Worcester

By SHAWN HEIN
Kansas State Collegian

It's getting to be that time of the semester again for K-State students — time to meet with an adviser to plan next semester's classes.

Pre-enrollment can be a head-splitting time that leaves students with more questions than answers.

Student Body President Jake Worcester said he wants that experience to change for students.

"We want it to not just be an appointment, but as an investment in a student's future," Worcester said.

Worcester said he wants to implement a common university philosophy into advising by faculty. Being able to obtain knowledgeable advice on classes, dual majors and job opportunities available within a major are improvements Worcester would like to see. Part of his philosophy includes having faculty members evaluated and held accountable for the advising they give.

"If 20 percent of their time is spent advising, then 20 percent of their evaluation should be based on advising," he said.

Worcester said he is waiting on the results of a nearly two-year study done by the all-university task force on advising. The results of the study are supposed to be complete sometime later in the semester.

Jon Kurche, Student Governing Association academic affairs director and cabinet member, said the type of academic advising they are suggesting already is supposed to be in place. The guidelines stated in the K-State Faculty Handbook are similar to what Worcester and his cabinet are proposing. The problem, however, is what is actually being done.

"What is stated in the faculty handbook and what is really being done is a far cry from the other," Kurche said.

Kurche said some of the problems arise in how the different colleges at K-State are structured.

"You take the College of Business — they have a lot of students and don't have many people designated for advising," he said. "So, to ask them to meet with each student personally is a problem."

Despite some of the problems, students still should be able to get the help they need, Worcester said.

"Different departments should have different systems, but every student should have some minimum expectations met," he said. "We need to leave it up to departments to meet expectations."

Julie Katz, an academic adviser in the College of Business Administration for seven years, said the college has only four advisers. This is something she said needs to change.

"I would like for them to hire more advisers," she said. "Right now, each of us have approximately 800 advisees."

Despite the low number of advisers, the system for her college has worked pretty well, Katz said.

"Last year we were able to help 90 percent of the students in the College of Business Administration," she said.

Katz said the college assigns a faculty mentor to each student who is a junior or senior for additional help. The mentors offer more detailed help for their students and help students with questions about job markets, internships or dual degrees.

Brandon Reinert, sophomore in business and corporate finance, said while he thinks his advisers do a good job, improvements in the system could be made, like making classes more available.

"I enjoy going to them," Reinert said. "They've actually helped get me into some classes that were closed."

Postmaster enjoys daily challenges, problem solving

By JAMIE BARRETT
Kansas State Collegian

EVAN SEMON/Collegian

Marvin Roth (right), postmaster at the U.S. Postal Service office in Manhattan, oversees a bulk mail order with Wilson Fontmayor Bulk (left), mail technician for the Central Plains district.

Keeping 50,000 people happy every day is the main concern for Manhattan Postmaster Marvin Roth.

"The post office is one of the only places where every person in Manhattan is one of your customers," Roth said.

Since 1982, Roth has served as the postmaster of the Manhattan Post Office. Roth said his job has something different for him to do every day.

"I work with supervisors and make sure the operations run smoothly," he said. "I also go out on routes on occasion so that is a change from the paperwork."

Roth graduated from Fort Hays State University in 1978 with a master's degree in business administration and has worked for the U.S. Postal Service for 30 years.

"Before I came to Manhattan, I worked in Hays as the financial director for the western one-third of the state," Roth said.

Roth said working in a town with such a high population of college students is an original experience for a postal worker.

"There are many students who leave and do not leave a forwarding address," he said. "Lots of students stop their phone and water but do not leave a change of address. During the summer, a large part of my activity is dealing with students and forwarded mail."

Letter carrier Dennis Lauters said Roth has a massive amount of responsibility to deal with every day and does so in a timely manner.

"If Marvin fails at his job, there is mass confusion," Lauters said. "If things are not done on time, mail does not get out on time and people become angry. Marvin does a good job to breaking everything down into a strict time table."

Roth said although being the postmaster requires much patience and people skills, it is one of his favorite things about his job.

"Right now one of my favorite things is to resolve problems," Roth said. "I find it to be challenging to help people resolve problems they may have."

Roth said problem solving is not something that typically would be associated with the job of a postmaster, but it takes up quite a bit of his time.

"People come in pulling out their hair and calling me names sometimes, and my goal is to get to the root of their problem," he said. "If someone comes in with a complaint, I am going to narrow it down and work it out with them."

Roth said he attributes his success and management skills to being involved with the business for so many years.

"Years of experience really have made me realize how the system works and I know where to go to resolve problems better than someone who would have to go out and do a lot of research," he said.

Deb Roth, Roth's wife, said she sees how successful Roth is at his job by observing him outside of the post office.

"Marvin really has very good people skills," Deb Roth said. "I think one of his favorite things is when he sees people in the community and they give him a good word."

Roth said his main concern is making sure Manhattan residents are happy with the post office and it stays that way.

"I went to the game on Saturday and thought that it was really interesting that almost all of the people in purple and white are my daily customers," he said. "There are not many jobs where you can say that."

Beef: it's what's for dinner

Radical cow group lists demands of equality for return of Collegian columnist

Editor's note: A regularly scheduled opinion column was not turned in this week. In its place was a manifesto scrawled in barely decipherable crayon. In accordance to its demands, we publish it here in its entirety. (It has been run through spell-check and grammatically cleansed, and all obvious obscenities removed.)

We have your columnist — this is day one.

The Bovine Liberation Front has noted, with no small sense of alarm, the continuing sense of "ownership" you humans show over other living creatures. You collect us, then you grind us up and eat us. Why? What have we, the peaceful, benevolent Bovine-Americans done to you? We love you. Well, we don't love you much anymore. But at least we don't grind you up and eat you, either, and, frankly, you should thank us.

MILK SHAKE

You think because we're docile and placid that we can't mix it up, don't you? Listen, buster, that placidity takes a lot of time and effort. We Bovine-Americans have perfected this state of near-Zen balance, this harmony between self and nature, and what do you do? Do you try to learn from our achievement? Do you treat us with dignity and awe? No! You friggin' EAT us!

The consensus has been that maybe you're all just a little slow on the ball. We thought maybe you figured that you could capture our bovine calm by consuming us en masse. Then it dawned on us. You weren't seeking spiritual enlightenment. You weren't fulfilling a metaphysical quest. You were just hungry. Don't you think that would make us upset?

Well, it would. But we're cows. It's really hard for us to get excited about anything. Graze, graze, moo, graze, sleep. That's been our daily schedule for millennia, but no longer. Now the hoof strikes home.

There are those who will insist ours is a political agenda. Let me boil down the politics quickly and succinctly:

1. You eat us.
2. We don't like it.

There's more, of course. You skin us and make us into seat covers and jackets and purses and shoes and naughty things. Personally, we're of mixed feelings on that aspect of the whole human-bovine exploitation. I mean, it's touching that you like us enough to make us such a welcome part of your culture. But we wish there was a better way to do so without, oh, ripping our skin off. It's inconvenient. And while we pride ourselves on being a placid and reasonable species, I mean, you've got to draw the line somewhere.

If you want to keep us penned up in pastures, fed and watered, hey, that's great. We'd like to have our own places, but I think we're all agreed that communal living isn't that bad. Sure, it gets cold outside, and sometimes the thunderstorms and flooding and extreme heat does wear on us, especially the little ones, but as long as you're not driving bolts through our skulls and yanking our guts out, we'll be thankful.

So, outlined now is the BLF's list of demands.

1. Stop eating us.
2. Warm up your hands before you milk us. You have no idea how bad that feels.
3. Stop eating us.
4. Wait until we die before you make us into executive chairs.
5. If you're going to truck us around the country, could you at least let one of us ride in the front every once in a while?
6. Why don't you eat more of some other animals? Pork's good. Chickens are stupid. And you can catch your own squirrels. We hear mutton's kinda tasty, and there's always hamster bites.
7. The rings in the nose and the ear are nice, but a cow could use a little variety in piercings.
8. Can we get some representation on your sports teams? I know a calf who's quite good at cross country. And have you ever tried to tackle a cow? (We'll work harder on carrying the ball. Really).
9. Grass, hay, grass, hay. How about some cole slaw every once in a while? And maybe a soft drink? In a bottle?
10. Some broccoli would be quite good right now, you know.

If an adequate number of our demands are not met, we will continue penning up columnists until ... until we run out of columnists, I guess, at which point we'll start grabbing line artists and copy editors and designers ...

OK, maybe you're resting pretty now, but what're you going to do when we come for the volleyball team? Hmm?

The BLF awaits your decision. The future of Bovine-American relations is at hand. The cows are watching you.

Milk shake is a future hamburger patty. You can reaeh his captive at sigma7@ksu.edu.

Advising plan improvement for university

Since students evaluate their professors, it makes sense for students to evaluate the people who assist us in getting those professors — the advisers.

Student Body President Jake Worcester wants to implement a common university philosophy into advising by faculty. With this policy, students would be able to get advice on classes, dual majors and internships as well as job opportunities. With this additional responsibility would come evaluations for advising.

This would definitely benefit colleges with an extremely large amount of students, particularly the College of Business Administration.

The college now operates with only four advisers, which is ridiculous considering the amount of advising they have to undertake — 800 students per adviser.

With overloaded situations like this, not only do the advisers suffer, but students suffer as well.

This plan, if implemented, will work well for the university as a whole.

However, responsibility does not completely fall onto the shoulders of advisers.

Students should be more knowledgeable about the courses they need to take in order to fulfill their requirements. Academic success won't come from someone who only meets with students once a semester.

NBA commissioner's decision right

"Sticks and stones may break my bones, but words can never hurt me." This simple childhood phrase should once again be remembered for the duration of the new controversy involving Philadelphia 76ers guard Allen Iverson.

Iverson has taken his courtside trash-talking to the studio to record a rap album due to hit stores in February.

Apparently, some of the lyrics on the album were offensive to homosexuals, women and blacks. Iverson has met with leaders of civil rights groups to discuss the upcoming album and, after meeting with NBA Commissioner David Stern last week, has agreed to change the most offensive of the song lyrics.

I believe the decision by David Stern not to punish Iverson with suspensions and fines is a good one. Unlike Bud Selig, who attempted to suspend Atlanta Braves pitcher John Rocker for a month for offensive comments that he made last year, Stern came to the same decision that everyone else should realize. Sports stars' comments about social issues are not justification for their suspensions on the field of play.

In the early 1990s, Charles Barkley created controversy himself by declaring in one Nike ad that he was not a role model. I was a bit disappointed at the time because I thought he was a fine role model. Chuck was a big Republican who could pass, rebound and dunk the basketball.

Unfortunately, he also liked to get into bar brawls. But that statement by Barkley is one that should still stay true today. Athletes are not teachers or politicians. They are admired for their talents in sport, not their individual social stances.

Indeed, it also should be true that actions speak louder than words. Baltimore Oriole Roberto Alomar spit in the face of an umpire; he was to receive only a five-game suspension to be carried out during the next season. Dennis Rodman saw fit to kick a hapless cameraman in his bits and pieces after accidentally falling over him during a Chicago Bulls game.

RICK WOOTEN

Both of these stars did not receive nearly the criticism and stigma that Rocker faced and Iverson is dealing with.

The actions of Alomar and Rodman on the field were much worse for their respective sports than anything Rocker and Iverson have said.

There is a degree to which all employees should be kept accountable for their "off-field" words and actions. O.J. Simpson was relieved of his duties as a rental car spokesman, broadcaster and bad actor in Naked Gun movies. Of course, O.J. didn't really murder two people anyway, right?

Perhaps the real killers were Rocker and Iverson, and they found out that Ron Goldman and Nicole Brown were, in fact, purple-haired homosexuals. Maybe I will forward this theory to the new AskOJ.com web site.

Our own U.S. president engaged in unruly behavior in a government office building, yet he was not fined or suspended a single dollar or day (which should be the only way Al Gore might become president). Clinton's actions were more or less the same as those of "Seinfeld" character George Costanza who had sex with a maid while working late in the office. George got fired. Clinton got a hummer. Where's the justice here?

Rocker's comments about New York's seven train were much less damaging to baseball than Clinton's office of the president.

The fact that Iverson and Rocker have the courage to speak their minds on homosexuality, racism, violence and societal decay provides a forum for provocative dialogue.

If we can assume that these two individuals are not the only ones who feel the way that they do, then we also must recognize a strong sign that society has not come quite as far as some believe in regards to accepting different cultures and lifestyles.

While Rocker and Iverson are not personal role models of mine and their views are not what I would call politically correct, I respect the fact that they feel comfortable speaking their own minds with little or no regrets.

Freedom of speech is a right that should not only be granted to those behind a formal pulpit, but also to those who happen to have the microphone during their short-term celebrity status.

Let Allen shoot. Let John pitch. Let freedom ring.

Kansas health premiums too expensive for retirees

Editor,

In the past few days, there have been articles in the newspapers about the Legislatures, comparing their wages with the four bordering states and how they want their wages to be raised.

I have been doing a comparison with the four bordering states, also — my comparison has to do with the price of health care premiums a classified employee retired from K-State pays.

Hold onto your hats — a single premium for someone retiring before the age of 65 will pay $263.71. My husband and I will spend $527.42 a month for health care. That is practically my whole retirement check. I have checked with the human resource offices of all four bordering states and so far I have found that Kansas ranks dead last as far as out of pocket spending on behalf of their retirees.

My next comparison will be with all of the Big 12 universities. Does anyone want to bet Kansas will be pretty close to the last if not the last?

Ambassador candidates seek to serve K-State

Homecoming Week 2000

Emily Benz
senior in secondary education

Reason for coming to K-State: Honestly, coming out of high school, K-State was not my first choice for college, but I have done a complete 180 since then. I immediately felt important and became a part of the community here my freshman year. I had full intentions to spend only a semester or two here until I realized the amazing people who surrounded me. K-State provided a challenging environment where I was able to enrich and extend myself. It's more than simply a university, and people are faces and names instead of numbers. We have everything that a Big 12 school can offer and yet retain a sense of community and tradition.

BENZ

Favorite thing about K-State: My favorite thing about K-State is the people. There is an feeling of pride that goes along with being a part of K-State. From the students to the faculty and administration to the alumni, the people in and around the university are striving for higher standards and are pursuing excellence and this is evident in every aspect of student life. Whether it is our athletic teams or our classrooms, our greek system or our residence halls, our student government or multicultural groups, the people are what makes the difference. Long after I graduate I won't necessarily remember the grades I got in a certain class or a particular chapter or lesson, but I will remember the people and the experiences that impacted my life.

What do you want to accomplish as an ambassador? As an ambassador I would like to be able to express to people the possibilities that can be found by being a part of K-State. I want prospective and current students to see the wealth of opportunity that awaits them here. An ambassador should represent all the best things about K-State and be honest about the issues we are working on, and that is what I will do. I can show people through my experiences that K-State can be the university for them.

Sarah Geiger
junior in agriculture education

Reason for coming to K-State: K-State offered the two things I was looking for in a university — a quality education in the College of Agriculture and a welcoming atmosphere. With every interaction with my admissions representative, the deans in the College of Agriculture and with each student, I discovered a university that cared about every student and I found a place that I could call home.

Favorite thing about K-State: My favorite thing about K-State is the people. Smiling faces on campus, committed faculty and administrators and a great circle of friends are the reasons I value my K-State experience. It's the people here who make K-State a top university and who make our college years so memorable.

GEIGER

What do you want to accomplish as an ambassador? As an ambassador I hope to share more than just the facts. There's more to being a student than going to class, joining a club or two and attending sporting events. This experience is about discovering your dreams and fears, creating lifetime friendships and sharing the long-standing K-State tradition. I hope to share this with those beyond these limestone walls, to celebrate the total college experience and to recruit new Wildcats to become a part of K-State.

Rebekka Martin
junior in agricultural communications and journalism and animal science

Reason for coming to K-State: I toured K-State because of its record for excellent academic programs. I came to K-State because the students and faculty were friendly and outgoing and they showed me how I could fit into the campus. That made the difference for me.

MARTIN

Favorite thing about K-State: The people. They are fun, enthusiastic and committed to being the best. The people I've met here and the memories I have with them will always be my favorite thing about K-State.

What do you want to accomplish as an ambassador? K-Staters are so supportive of our university. It would be great to have even stronger traditions to cement that loyalty in both alumni and current students. I want to build traditions through existing programs like Wildcat Warm-Up, Senior Send-off and alumni reunions.

Adam Hemmen
sophomore in marketing

Reason for coming to K-State: The K-State experience began with all the personal notes, phone calls and tours introducing me to the university and its many opportunities. K-State's recruitment program was amazing. While looking at colleges, I truly felt that K-State atmosphere was for me.

HEMMEN

Favorite thing about K-State: Everything. From the friendly atmosphere to the rec. From the newly renovated union to the nap chairs at Hale Library. From the football games to the wheel lock I received yesterday while parking at the Union. These experiences combined with many others make K-State the home that it is to me.

What do you want to accomplish as an ambassador? It is my hope that I will be able to represent the entire student body. Through the Alumni Association events, I would like to show our alumni K-State's continued excellence in every aspect of college life. To the prospective student, I would like to assist them in making one of the hardest decisions of their life by showing them all that K-State has to offer. Finally, to K-State students, I would like to remind them of how their journey began, their opportunities after they leave and to enjoy everything in between.

Brian Karlin
junior in accounting

Reason for coming to K-State: The biggest reason I came to K-State was the recruiting style that was used when I was in high school. K-State recruiters stood out in my mind above the ones from MU and KU. With Mizzou, I felt like a number that would be overlooked or lost in the shuffle. KU recruiters made it seem like I should be honored to attend their school. The K-State recruiters made me feel welcome and seemed like they truly wanted me to attend school here.

Favorite thing about K-State: The diversity of the student body is my favorite thing about K-State. A lot of colleges try to get a certain type of student to attend their university. The students on this campus are not clones of each other. The student body comes from a variety of backgrounds and has a variety of different interests. Students here come from all parts of the state, not to mention out of state students who come in from places including Chicago, Texas and Canada.

KARLIN

What do you want to accomplish as an ambassador? As an ambassador, I hope to continue the trend K-State has set. I want to help recruit students from all over the state to keep this diverse campus that we have. I want the opportunity to thank alumni for their contributions of time and money to this university. I am interested in trying to do my part to give back to K-State. College is a spectacular time in life, and I want to show my thanks by becoming an ambassador and representing the student body. By bringing more new students into K-State and showing our appreciation to the ones that have graduate, I hope to keep the atmosphere the student body has at a peak for the years to come.

Spencer Stelljes
sophomore in political science

Reason for coming to K-State: Initially deciding on whether to attend K-State was difficult. However, after taking a campus tour and visiting with professors in my major track and others as well, I realized I wanted to attend a university where I would be treated like a person and not a number. At K-State they do in fact practice what they sell to you, while at the same time making a concerned effort to find what attributes and qualities make you as a person and try to accommodate you as best as possible during your stay here at K-State.

STELLJES

Favorite thing about K-State: The atmosphere of K-State would have to be my favorite thing. I am amazed that even though this campus boasts well over 22,000 students, it feels like a campus of only 2,000. I would have to say that most students don't feel lost and rather feel right at home and accepted. I attribute this to the fact that the majority of students feel a strong sense of community is most important to them. Because of this sense of community, students and faculty are willing to say hello or give you a helping hand at any given time.

What do you want to accomplish as an ambassador? If elected as an ambassador, I would want to promote a diverse class of students to attend this university, help convince students this is a university that can boast a broad range of majors and promote the great student life activities a student can discover once they attend K-State.

SOLID finish

STORY BY NICK BRATKOVIC

PHOTOS BY MATT STAMEY/Collegian

Women's golf takes 3rd at home tournament

A third-place finish just isn't what it used to be for the K-State women's golf team.

It isn't much more than a solid performance, head coach Kristi Knight said.

"I think we had another solid tournament," she said. "I know they wanted to win, but still, it was a solid event."

Junior Edie Murdoch said competing in the eight-team field with the likes of Big 12 foes Missouri and Iowa State was nice, but the players' expectations have risen.

"I think the level has changed. When I first got here, 309 was a great day, but now it is not," she said. "Now, 300 would be considered a great score."

The Cats finished behind the Tigers and Cyclones in the Marilynn Smith/Sunflower Invitational at Colbert Hills, despite shooting a 309 final round in which they beat the eventual champion Mizzou by three-strokes.

Knight said that despite the disappointment, it was a strong performance for the Cats, as Murdoch's third place finish sparked K-State through much of the tournament.

"Edie had a great tournament," Knight said. "I think she is just striking the ball real well, and was able to hit a lot of greens."

Murdoch's final round of 74 came one day after back-to-back rounds of 76. Entering the final day, she said she had a different philosophy.

"I felt like I played pretty good, but I left some shots out there," Murdoch said Tuesday. "Today, as opposed to yesterday, I kind of took Coach's advice and just tried to make putt and move on."

Murdoch's two-stroke improvement was common for the Cats, as four of the five K-State golfers improved on their second round scores.

One such golfer was freshman Christine Boucher, who shot a 79, but she said she wasn't exactly pleased with her play.

"I was better today," she said. "I thought my game was better. I hit a lot of greens, but I was still not pleased with my putting."

The lone Wildcat who shot a higher score in the third round was sophomore Miranda Smith, who shot an 82, but unfortunately, her higher score was in line with the rest of the field.

"Scores were much higher today across the board," Knight said. "Only two teams shot under 310, and we were one of them."

Knight said day two of the tournament had a different feel to it.

"There were really a couple of different factors out there today," Knight said. "One was the wind, two, the pin placement was tougher and three, they were walking."

Game Stats:

Team Scores:

310-313-309 – 932 (3rd of 8)

Individual Scores:

T3	Edie Murdoch	76-76-74 – 226
11	Lindsay Hammerschmidt	76-80-79 – 235
T17	Christine Boucher	77-82-79 – 238
T20	Miranda Smith	81-76-82 – 239
T22	Elise Carpentier	82-81-77 – 240

Junior and Manhattan native Lindsay Hammerschmidt said walking the 6,043-yard, par 72 course on the final day improved her performance.

"I think it was an advantage that we walked the course," she said.

Hammerschmidt shot a 79 on the last 18 holes, but the highlight was how she finished, she said. Due to starting on the back nine as opposed to the front, her round met some adversity on hole No. 1, which, being actually her 10th hole, forced her to regroup.

"Well, I was three-over for hole No. 1," she said, "so I had to shoot even for the final eight holes, and I did."

Cats prepare for Nebraska in volleyball

By MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

When K-State plays top-ranked Nebraska tonight, the Cats actually might feel as at home as the Cornhuskers.

Four of K-State's starters in volleyball hail from Nebraska, the same number as in the Husker starting line-up.

As a result, Fremont, Neb., native Jenny Pollard said the Cats aren't intimidated by the away game at Nebraska Coliseum. In fact, some of the players even call it home.

Tonight's Action:

K-STATE
13-4, 7-2
AT NEBRASKA
17-0, 9-0

WHEN: 7 p.m.
WHERE: Nebraska Coliseum, Lincoln, Neb.
TV: Fox Sports Net on a tape-delayed basis
RADIO: KMAN 1350 AM

"You definitely want to play your best, especially when's it at home," Pollard said. "That's just that much sweeter, especially when you win. It means a little bit more when you're playing back home."

Giving those Cats, five in all, from up north, even more incentive to play well is the fact that most of them were not recruited very hard by the Huskers. There is some revenge factor, Pollard said.

"Definitely. There's no hard feelings, but of course when you play against a team like that, you want to show them the best that you have," the outside hitter said.

However, for players such as Kelle Branting, Liz Wegner, Lisa Mimick and Jayne Christen, revenge is no longer important. Instead, they play for team recognition, Wegner said.

"If I had any revenge, maybe it was last year," the outside hitter from Grand Island, Neb., said. "This year, I just want to go in there and show K-State pride, and show them that K-State is a good team and that we should get some recognition."

The Wildcats, ranked 20th by Volleyball Magazine, might have emotion on their side, but Nebraska still will have the fans — and the Coliseum is known for being loud, Mimick said.

"The Coliseum's a great place to play. The fans are close to the court like they are here at home," the junior outside hitter from Spencer, Neb., said. "It's really loud — it's pretty intimidating. They put a pretty big hype on it, too, but yet I think most of us use it to our advantage."

An advantage for the Huskers, though, is that they've dominated every team so far this season. In fact, they have only lost one game in the last nine matches.

"They're just a sound team. They're number one in the nation for a reason," Wegner said.

In addition, K-State has only beaten Nebraska once in 60 meetings. That lone victory came last year in Lincoln. As a result, Wegner said the Cats feel they are an equal on the court.

"It's a different mentality. We just have that confidence now," she said. "We don't walk in the gym going, 'Oh, we're playing Nebraska!' We're an even team, and anything can happen. We've just got to go in there and serve and pass well, and we'll be okay.

"We can beat them. We've done it, and we can do it again."

Senior basketball guard's diary available on Web site for fans

By MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

Generally, a diary is meant for the writer's eyes only, but this basketball season, K-State guard Kim Woodlee will be baring her soul for all to see.

On Sept. 15, the senior from Beersheba Springs, Tenn., began publishing weekly diary entries in the women's basketball section of K-State's sports information Web site, www.k-statesports.com.

Online:

Fans can read Woodlee's diary entries by logging onto www.k-statesports.com and selecting the women's basketball icon.

The purpose of the entries are simply to give fans a perspective of the team as well as create more awareness of the team, said Michele Dubert, assistant sports information director and diary creator.

"We just wanted to draw more people to the women's basketball site," Dubert said. "It gives fans an inside view of what goes on from a player's perspective."

Creating and maintaining that fan awareness is of utmost importance, Woodlee said.

"We have fans that follow us pretty closely, so it's good for them to find out what's going on instead of wondering," she said. "You don't know how much it means to have that much fan support."

To create that inside perspective, it was important to choose the right person to write the entries. Dubert said Woodlee was an obvious choice.

"She's a senior, and she's pretty smart, so we figured she could probably put some words together," Dubert said.

Evidently, Woodlee has been at least somewhat successful in writing interesting entries. She said she already has received much positive feedback from readers, but often is surprised by the amount of information readers take away from the site.

"At Junior Wildcat Day, I had lots of people come up to me and tell me that they've been reading them," Woodlee said. "I've had people come up to me and talk to me about stuff, and I was like, 'How do you know that?' and then I remember."

The entries are not just factual. Woodlee said she also tries to mix in humor to portray the attitude of the team. For instance, Woodlee has mentioned several times how excited she and the rest of team are about the approaching first practice.

"Preseason is the most difficult part of the season," Woodlee said.

"You don't see immediate playing time — there's no games. We just beat up on each other."

To convey that anticipation of practice, Woodlee wrote Sept. 27: "Practice is getting closer and closer. Only 16 days left. And on the 17th day God said, 'Let there be practice. And it was good.'"

Many of Woodlee's entries also have focused on the newest crop of Wildcats, who already have made their mark on the team, she said.

"People want to know if the freshmen are doing well, if everybody's healthy, how everything's going," she said. "I couldn't help but comment about the freshmen, because they have blown me away. I'm real excited about them."

As a result of the freshmen and their ability to push the seniors, the team should be very competitive this year and entries will continue to be exciting, Woodlee said.

"It's going to be a cat fight," she said. "We needed that kind of pressure and depth. We're all working together."

Men's rugby team prepares for game in Wichita, rest of season with vigor

By DAN SMITH
Kansas State Collegian

K-State's men's rugby team wants to make a statement this season, junior Chris Darrow said.

That statement is to become the team to beat in the Heart of America Union, and for this year's group of players, that means more of the same, said Darrow, a fullback for the club.

Teams in Kansas, Nebraska, Missouri and parts of Iowa and Colorado, all have tested the 28-year-old Wildcat club that has compiled an 8-2 record so far in this year's fall campaign.

The team's eight wins at this point in the season include an emotionally charged win over host-team Wichita on Sept. 30 in the Ferrisfest Tournament that featured six teams, said Laef Fox, Fort Riley resident and second-row flanker for the team.

"It was a big game — it was under the lights and it was in Wichita. It was a hard-fought game," he said. "We went 19 extra minutes and it was cool to beat them in front of their home fans."

K-State's win over Wichita gave the Cats bragging rights over the teams' rival, Fox said, at least until they're thrown into the scrum Oct. 28, when the teams meet again in Wichita.

The squads will match up again on that day for a merit table game that will mean more in terms of season ranking than the Ferrisfest tournament game, and fourth year player Derrick Borgmann expects the Wichita squad to be ready for the rematch.

Random athletics-related musings focus on Aikman, subway series, Wildcat hopes

RICH SMITH

Writer's block, perfectionism and a deadline. Not a pretty combination.

Despite research, meditation, acupuncture, caffeine, exercise, trying to rip off ESPN.com column ideas, praying to Allah for guidance and banging my head against the keyboard for 47 minutes straight, I have yet to come up with a single compelling inspiration for my column this week.

So, it's that time of the week where, from a creativity standpoint, I'm forced to wave the white flag of surrender. Please accept my condolences as you enjoy 18 column inches of my favorite journalistic cop-out: loosely connected thoughts. I'll do better next week, I swear.

*Speaking of loosely connected, can anyone explain to me the logic that allows Troy Aikman to continue playing in the National Football League?

Aikman has taken more blows to the head than a character in the old "Mike Tyson's Punch-Out" video game. Have you ever seen the man smile? It's like the left half of his face just isn't getting the message anymore.

His play clearly has started to decline as a result of age and injuries. His pass rating last year? A Steve Bono-worthy 81.1. This year, it's dipped into Ryan Leaf/Tommy Maddox territory at 38.5. Yet because of pride, or love of the game, or malfunctioning neurons, the oft-concussed quarterback continues to trot onto the field every week as the world's highest-paid tackling dummy for a 2-4 Dallas team.

Aikman has more money than some banking institutions, three Super Bowl rings, numerous Pro Bowl appearances, his health and his youth. He has nothing more to achieve. He needs to swallow his pride and retire soon, before he incurs a debilitating injury. The man has earned a long and prosperous retirement — it's time to start enjoying it.

*Speaking of enjoyment, that tiny scream you hear is my last waning speck of interest in Major League Baseball being forever extinguished by the prospect of a "subway series" between the Mets and Yankees.

Seriously, does anyone not from Queens think this is a good thing? What possible good can it bring? Quality baseball? Perhaps. Fun for New Yorkers? Definitely.

But the other 210 million of us Americans are left on the outside looking in. If the league is smart, they'll immediately relocate the Yankees to, say, Las Vegas, to pique the interest of the other half of the country.

On the plus side, maybe this will make a persuasive case for long-overdue revenue sharing with smaller markets. And it's also kinda fun to imagine how trash-talking would work out between opposing New York fans ... (Bat-wielding Yankees fan: "Yo, Mets suck. Hand over your watch.")

*Speaking of plus sides, chin up there, little Wildcat fans. Yes, Saturday's loss hurts, and yes, in terms of media respect, we're pretty much at the back of the line with Ball State now.

But not all is lost. I think K-State can climb back into the national title hunt. I say "think," because I don't have the requisite backgrounds in quantum mechanics and chaos theory to interpret the BCS formulae. I'm not sure Stephen Hawking does, frankly.

So call it a hunch, then, but a strong one. Four of the teams ahead of K-State in the polls play each other before the season is out. So, theoretically at least, K-State could move up four spots by winning out.

If they can muster convincing victories over (hopefully no. 1) Nebraska, and then Oklahoma in the Big 12 title game, while getting a lucky upset or two, they just might be able to hop back into the race. Keep your fingers crossed.

*Speaking of crossed fingers, does it bother anyone else that the Chiefs have allowed new placekicker Todd Peterson to wear Lin Elliott's old No. 2 jersey? That's a bad omen if I've ever seen one ... On the other hand, the Chiefs have no real title hopes for Peterson to botch, so I suppose in the end it's all academic, isn't it?

"They will be ready to play," the fifth-year senior in finance said, "but we'll be ready, too. They'll be pumped to beat us — it'll be a hard game for us."

Two merit table matches remain for the club team that is trying to lock down a return trip to the Western Region qualifiers, Borgmann said, for a chance to play in the national tournament at the end of the spring semester.

"Winning that Wichita tournament was a good thing for us," Darrow said. "It makes us practice harder for the games leading up to Western."

Wichita will line up against the K-State squad as a better skill team than the rest of the Wildcats' tournament opponents, he said.

The rivalry will continue in Wichita with the Cats relying on their physical pack players and skilled playmakers in the back of the field to get the club their second win over the them.

K-State's only other merit table match this fall pits the Wildcats against a more physical squad in Columbia, Borgmann said.

Columbia, an older team, will meet the Wildcats on Nov. 4 in Manhattan.

Sophomore Tony Buckner said that building on the team's success last year is the key for this year's team.

"We're coming off the Western qualifiers," Buckner said, "and we're building off that to win the big games that we need to win in Western."

For the club to restore its reputation when the team was regularly a powerhouse in the Midwest, it will need to build on its early success, Fox said, and focus on the team's remaining schedule.

"We want to win the rest of the year," Fox said, "and if we play well, we should be able to do it."

Guest speaker discusses relevance of Civil War, historical accuracy

By AMBER CUNNINGHAM
Kansas State Collegian

The Civil War was revisited Tuesday night as Carol Reardon, associate professor of history at Penn State, spoke about why the Civil War still matters to people across the nation.

Reardon is a visiting professor at the U.S. Army War College, the Marine Corps Command and General Staff College and the U.S. Military Academy at West Point.

Reardon said individuals began after the Civil War to write their interpretations of battles and events surrounding the war.

She said most were relating memories, while some were trying to gain more prestige and glory by fabricating actual events.

"Most people reconstruct the past instead of recording it," Reardon said. "They are trying to win public affection for their vision of the past."

There is a difference between memory and history, she said.

"History makes us think," Reardon said. "Memory makes us feel."

She used several narratives about Civil War events such as the Battle of Gettysburg to illustrate how memory differs from history.

Reardon said memory and history can work together, but they can also work against each other.

In more recent years, historians have started fighting back, she said. Reardon said that instead of allowing individual memories to represent the ideologies of specific parties, such as the Confederate Daughters or the Southern White Unionists, historians are searching deeper for the cause and results of the war.

Reardon then related the story of a 12-year-old boy visiting a battleground site, at which the boy said, "you finally get to know what they were fighting about."

"The light shines brightest on the symbols of the war," Reardon said. "The Confederate flag."

Reardon also related the story of a Southern man who made barbecue sauce sold in Wal-Mart. Because he displayed the Confederate flag, Wal-Mart pulled his sauce from their shelves.

Reardon said a large percentage of Wal-Mart employees are Hispanic or black.

"Memory still wins, but history is trying to make up for it," she said.

Reardon asked the audience if they had read "The Killer Angels" or seen the movie "Glory." Reardon said they both replicated history with a lot of liberties taken.

"We must not reconstruct the past based on what we thought it aught to have been," Reardon said. "We must reconstruct it as it was."

Fred Atchison, director of the Manhattan Public Library, said he was motivated by the lecture.

"It was an opportunity to hear a recognized authority speak about a problem in understanding and interpreting our history and what we believe to by true," Atchison said.

Atchison said he especially enjoyed the question-and-answer session in which Reardon stressed the importance of having to do to the work when interpreting what is and what isn't history, that one must think for oneself.

Katie Verschelden, freshman in business, said she came to learn more about the Civil War but was surprised to learn about how history is interpreted.

"I enjoy history, especially the Civil War," Verschelden said. "I had never put together the difference between memory and history. I learned not to take one person's words as truth."

'FIRST peek'

Art exhibit brings mixed media to Manhattan

By DAVID LAUNDER
Kansas State Collegian

Urban Designs is offering a "First Peek" at both its current art exhibit and its newly opened gallery.

Urban Designs in Aggieville is showcasing the work of several local artists in its most recent art show, "First Peek."

The art exhibit, which opened Monday and will run through Nov. 11, gives visitors a chance to view a variety of artwork ranging from ceramics to print combined in mixed media.

"We will always try to have a variety of things on display," Deborah Minner, co-owner of Urban Designs, said.

In addition to being able to view the artwork, people will be able to meet and greet the artists during an opening reception from 5 to 7 p.m. Friday. Minner said this will give a chance for anyone interested to discuss the artwork with those involved.

■ MORE INFO? Urban Design is on Moro Street. They are open from 9 a.m. to 6 p.m. Monday through Friday, and 10 a.m. to 6 p.m. on Saturday.

She said most of the artists participating in this exhibit are students at K-State working on either bachelor's or master's degrees in fine arts, and everyone involved in the show are local artists.

"These people will be very good in the future," she said. "We are happy to be getting them some exposure now."

One of the artists with works on display, Dane Webster, is a new photography instructor at K-State.

Webster, who just moved here from Washington D.C., is involved in a type of art known as mixed media, a technique that people in Manhattan might not have seen before.

"He offers many modern techniques new to Manhattan," Minner said. "He will also add diversity to the art department."

Another local artist exhibiting art is Valerie Petersen.

Petersen, a recent K-State graduate, is the only artist who will be displaying jewelry in the show.

"I'm excited," she said. "I'm really looking forward to seeing all the other pieces."

"First Peek" is one of the first art exhibits for the recently opened Urban Designs.

Minner said the Aggieville location will be conducive to students and other walk-in customers who frequent the district.

"We think that the location is great," she said. "We're hoping that this will give people walking by a chance to see some good artwork."

Tony Alt, senior in park and recreation administration, said he appreciates the extra opportunity to view local artwork.

"It is exciting to be able to see some of these young artists when they are just starting out," Alt said. "People in the community should enjoy what they have to offer."

Play provides actors with more female roles

By JJ DUNCAN
Kansas State Collegian

When choosing the play "Daughters" as the latest production of the Department of Speech Communication, Theater and Dance, two key factors played a role.

"I wanted to find a show that could give more female actors an opportunity to perform because there are quite a few females interested in acting but we have very few roles for them," said Tracey Hull, graduate student in theater and the play's director. "And I also like what the show stands for and what it deals with."

"Daughters," the story of five women in a family and the various hardships and trials they experience, opens Oct. 26 in the Purple Masque Theatre. The play deals with the interaction that occurs in the lives of the five women and the pains they go through as a family.

The five women span four generations of one Italian family, with four of them living under one roof. The play is presented to show how the women deal with things such as business, a father with throat cancer and even adultery. The complexity of the play and the characters make it an emotionally charged play, Hull said.

"It's an exhausting play for the actors, and it's also exhausting for me to watch when we do a run-through just because it's so intense and it's easy for me to be drawn in and feel empathy for the characters," she said.

Hull, who has only directed two other plays, said while she enjoys acting in productions, she prefers the director's chair.

The actors are just as integral, but she enjoys bringing the play to life on the stage through her control and direction, she said.

Elizabeth Otto, senior in theater, said she rarely acts in plays, though she often is involved with productions. Otto, who plays Tessie in "Daughters," said the power of the play is difficult to grasp from just from reading the script.

"You don't realize how deep things get and how intense things get until you actually put it on the stage and start to see the interaction of these characters," she said.

For an actor, the play is challenging due to the complexity of the characters, Mary Housewirth, graduate student in theater, said. Housewirth, who plays Mom, said the characters are written in such a way to project all the intricacies of a family.

"Each character is very distinct," she said. "There is so much that you can find out about these characters just by reading the script and that sense of family is definitely a major part of the show."

"Daughters" is a play that makes audience members look at their own families and analyze and compare them to the show, Hull said.

An underlying theme of the play is that no matter how many fights there are or how much animosity there is, families always will have that basic support system, she said.

The play challenges the audience to be put in the characters' shoes, by showing the relationships and tensions that are sometimes more common than some people think, Otto said.

"I'm sure in some way everyone in the audience will be able to relate to the play because we've all had to deal with death, and for some of us divorce, or even cheating," she said. "Some audience members will walk out of here saying, 'Thank God that's not me,' while others will be able to relate to it and know exactly what these characters went through."

City Commission passes removing Fremont parking

By JENNIFER O'NEILL
Kansas State Collegian

It was a bit of a debate, but parking spaces near the intersection of 12th and Fremont streets have been eliminated.

City Engineer Scott Crain went before the Manhattan City Commission on Tuesday night in an attempt to remove a total of 12 spaces as part of the ordinance approved Oct. 3, designed to allow better visibility near the streets.

Crain advised that five parking spaces on the west side of Fremont and seven on the east side be removed to better ensure the safety of drivers.

Larry Fox, owner of a duplex of Fremont and house manager for the Delta Sigma Phi house, spoke again in opposition for the spaces being removed.

"In many occasions it's difficult to see at that intersection and removing one or two spaces would clear it up, but removing seven to the east is excessive," he said.

Fox said given the area and the shortage of parking, he thinks that would be a good compromise.

Mike Hill, a property owner on Fremont, said he agreed the removal of 12 spaces is excessive.

He said he thinks safety is the real issue at hand and eliminating that many spaces would only cause more accidents with pedestrians.

"I would hate for this to be a trade off to more pedestrian accidents because we push people to park farther away and make them cross a busy street," he said.

The motion failed 2-3, but another motion of eliminating two spaces on the east and west sides of Fremont passed unanimously.

The second proposal came from Commissioner Ed Klimek, who thought the elimination of those spaces was more than adequate.

"By eliminating 12 spaces from that street, I think we're overcompensating for a problem that doesn't exist that badly," he said.

Commissioner Bruce Snead agreed with the proposal that would call for a no-parking zone 101 feet east and 101 feet west of the 12th Street center line.

"I'm pleased we're going to do something to compensate for the accidents that have occurred," he said. "This is a good compromise to maintain safety without overexaggerating."

Campaign to increase campus' diversity awareness, appreciation begins 1st phase

By NANCY FOSTER
Kansas State Collegian

"Diversity counts" is the message seen on 32,000 posters distributed throughout campus, in residence halls and greek houses as part of a new multi-year campaign.

The posters say diversity counts at K-State, in the classroom, real world, work place and in K-State organizations. They are intended to increase awareness and appreciation of diversity on campus and represent only the kickoff.

"We're excited, and we want others to get excited," Mordean Taylor-Archer, associate provost of diversity, said.

Taylor-Archer is leading the committee formed to achieve the campaign's goals. She said the idea behind the campaign stemmed from a meeting with President Jon Wefald and other administrators in May 1999.

"What was communicated was that we should make diversity more physically aware on campus," she said.

The posters, she said, are just the first phase. The committee decided the first phase would promote the Diversity Counts campaign through the media.

Funded by central administration, the campaign will include public service announcements on local radio stations, ads in the Collegian and articles in the faculty and staff publication In View. The In View articles will profile different people and how diversity has counted in their lives.

Sharon Morrow, director of university publications, said she hopes to see the first In View profile article sometime this month.

The posters have two different design series: the first is a series of four abstract designs, using different colors, and the second is a series of four more concrete designs, with the Diversity Counts logo in the middle.

She said they presented several different series of designs and the ones being used were the most liked.

The committee met with Provost James Coffman, presidential staff, Classified Senate, Faculty Senate and K-State-Salina. She said they tried, but were unable, to meet with Student Body President Jake Worcester.

Posters can be custom ordered, Morrow said, to say diversity counts in a specific college, department or organization.

Carol Oukrop, professor of journalism and mass communications, is a member of the committee and decided to get her public relations campaigns class involved. Two groups conducted research and produced campaigns.

"I thought they did a wonderful job," she said. "I was proud of both campaigns. Any campaign is a challenge, but I thought they really got into it and worked hard on it."

One group conducted a student survey, while the other conducted a faculty and staff survey.

Based on their findings, students made recommendations to the Diversity Counts committee on what the campaign could entail.

"My students had a number of other suggestions, but they haven't been implemented," Oukrop said. "I think we'll see some of their posters and press releases in later semesters."

Morrow said the campaign's purpose was not to impose views on students, but to encourage thought.

"This first year we just want people to be thinking about how diversity is important to them, and what does it mean to them," she said.

Taylor-Archer said she didn't know exactly what the multi-year campaign would entail, but the posters were a good start.

"It's the beginning stage to increase awareness of diversity," she said. "There's a number of different strategies and actions we can build on this."

DEBATEWATCH

was a town-hall approach, opposed to the formal format of the first and the round-table discussion for the second.

"I like the variety of the debates," Parker said.

She said each format has its pros and cons, but that the third format allowed them to humanize themselves.

"It let them show their stature as being sort of presidential images," she said.

One thing Parker said she especially liked during the debate was when the candidates turned the questions on each other.

"It makes them actually have to answer questions," Parker said. "It makes them get down to the point."

She said she felt both candidates dodged questions at certain points, and that they sometimes served their own agenda instead of listening and fully addressing the question.

As for how the candidates handled themselves during the debate, the response was mixed.

"He was very rude, very unpresidential like," Willis said of Gore. "He continually tried to interrupt Bush, which looks very bad in this kind of debate."

Parker said she felt how Gore presented himself was two-fold.

"At times, I think he presented himself well, knowing the facts and statistics on issues," she said. "Other times, I think he looked bad."

Though her vote was for Gore, she said he didn't exceed what she expected of him.

"He probably met my expectations, but he didn't exceed them," Parker said. "Neither candidate exceeded my expectations."

CARNAHAN

know how else you say it. Everything he was involved with, he put his heart in."

Planned Parenthood officials in St. Louis said Carnahan's death has cost them a staunch ally.

"Governor Carnahan was a man of principle who dedicated his career to improving the lives of all Missourians," said Paul M. Gianino, president and chief executive officer of Planned Parenthood of the St. Louis Region.

"Above all, Governor Carnahan was unwavering in his convictions and courageous in his support for the reproductive health and lives of women."

Carnahan, a graduate of the University of Missouri School of Law, had attended Homecoming festivities on Saturday in Columbia.

"We mourn his loss to our university, our state and our nation," chancellor Richard L. Wallace said in a statement. "We will miss him greatly as we would an old and true friend."

Elementary and secondary school teachers and students also will miss Carnahan, said Teresa Lupton of Blue Springs.

"I just cannot believe this," said Lupton, the national vice president of the Parent Teacher Association. "He was a really good friend to PTA. The parents and teachers have lost a really good friend and the children have lost their champion."

Many of Carnahan's fellow governors spoke fondly of him Tuesday.

"Mel was a wonderful public servant and a consummate politician," Gov. Bill Graves of Kansas said. "Above everything else, he loved his family, the people and the state of Missouri."

Carnahan's death came as he campaigned against Republican U.S. Sen. John Ashcroft for Ashcroft's Senate seat.

"That's going to put Ashcroft in, and that makes me nervous as hell," said Joe Foster of Lee's Summit, a security guard at the Science City museum in Kansas City. "Carnahan, to me, was a pretty good politician in that he supported the needy problems of the state."

CLASH

recent years, and pledged to build on it. "I'll make you one promise here. You ain't seen nothing yet, and I will keep that promise."

Under the rules, Republican Bush got the last word. "I think after three debates the good people of this country understand there is a difference," he said. "The difference between a big federal government and someone who is coming from outside Washington who will trust individuals."

Gore has slipped slightly in the polls since the first campaign debate Oct. 3 in Boston, and from the opening moments, the vice president bore in on Bush as a defender of the privileged. He said the Texas governor was allied with insurance companies rather than patients, for example, and that his tax cut was tilted heavily toward the wealthy.

"If you want someone who will support ... the big drug companies, this is your man," the vice president said of Bush, standing a few feet away from his campaign rival on a red-carpeted debate stage.

"If you want someone who will fight for you ... then I want to fight for you," Gore said.

Most polls show Bush ahead of the vice president by a scant point or two, and the debate at the field house at Washington University represented the last, best chance for one man or the other to gain the support of a large critical bloc of undecided voters.

Gore was the aggressor, particularly early in the evening. At one point, as Bush was answering one question, the vice president walked to within three or four feet of the governor on stage and faced his rival. Bush, noticing that his rival had drawn close, responded with a surprised look and a smile.

In a debate that ranged broadly over campaign topics, a question about the death penalty provided an emotional moment.

Bush was told by one questioner, a black man, that in an earlier debate he had seemed proud of the fact that Texas had executed more criminals than any other state. "I'm not proud of that," Bush said in soft-spoken reply. "Some of the hardest moments since I've been the governor of Texas is to deal with those cases." Several times he referred to his questioner as "sir," and several times, stressed he wasn't proud, merely carrying out his responsibilities as governor. In all, Texas has executed 145 inmates since Bush took office in 1995.

The debate began with a moment of reflection in memory of Missouri Gov. Mel Carnahan, killed along with his son and a campaign aide Monday night when his small plane went down in bad weather. Bush and Gore both bowed their heads and closed their eyes when moderator Jim Lehrer asked for a brief period of silence.

With the somber moment over, Gore seemed eager to carry the fight to his Republican rival in a debate that permitted members of the audience to ask questions.

When the first question was asked about legislation pending in Congress to strengthen the hand of patients dealing with their HMOs, Gore said, "I support it and the governor does not."

Moments later, Bush rebutted: "Actually, Mr. Vice president, it's not true. I do support a national patients' bill of rights." He added that as governor of Texas, he had worked with Republicans and Democrats to win passage of a law that grants women greater access to gynecological care; gives patients greater choice over their doctor; and permits lawsuits against insurance companies after an external review.

"It requires a different leadership style to do it though," Bush said. "You see, you have to put partisanship aside and that's what I did in my state."

Bush and Gore also disagreed on another aspect of health care, the vice president saying the nation should "move step by step toward universal health coverage, but I do not think that the government should do all of it."

Bush responded moments later, "I am absolutely opposed to a national care plan. I don't want the federal government making decisions for consumers or providers." He reminded the audience in the hall and watching on television of President Clinton's failed national health insurance proposal in 1994.

Napster use could cost KSU thousands

By BRYAN SCRIBNER
Kansas State Collegian

Allowing Napster use via the campus Internet provider could cost the university.

Beth Unger, vice provost for academic services and technology, said Napster services might cost $7,200 per month and more than $86,000 per year. This money would come from the information technology budget.

The university's current bill for Internet service is about $280,000. The provider also charges $900 for each megabyte per second sent through the system. Unger said this additional fee would take money that could fund other campus technologies.

Data retrieved Sept. 29 and Oct. 2 indicated that 13.63 megabytes per second of Napster traffic was passing through the provider. Residence hall occupants who used Napster were responsible for about 80 percent of these bytes, Unger said.

"We can afford so much bandwidth use and have to cut it," she said. "What we're finding now is a few large users — we've approached them, and they are willing to stop."

Napster was introduced to computer users about two years ago. It is a program that allows for direct trade of music files though the Internet.

Unger said most of these files are not being used for educational purposes.

Although the program is legal, she said other types of illegal file-sharing also might be taking place.

The Internet is being used by K-State for class assignments, discussion groups, live lectures and other educational purposes. Unger said programs like Napster also are resulting in slower Internet access in classrooms.

Students who use the campus provider are charged a connection fee of $5, $10 or $15 per month, depending on how much they use the service. Those living in residence halls are charged a one-time fee of $150, but this money does not fund the technology budget, Unger said.

Unger said the university is considering traffic shaper hardware as a possible solution to the problem. She said the hardware would monitor bytes flowing in and out of the system.

The university's current bill for Internet service is about $280,000. The provider also charges $900 for each megabyte per second sent through the system. Unger said this additional fee would take money that could fund other campus technologies.

The shaper would establish a priority system that would allow for a maximum amount of Napster use to pass through the system. Other services, such as e-mail, would not be affected.

Richard Becker, network technology manager for the university, said the shaper would cost $13,000. Additional software required for the system would cost $3,000.

Becker said a trial of the hardware is being sent to K-State. He said it will not be purchased until it has been tested.

The hardware, Unger said, would slow the download rate of Napster files. She said this would hopefully discourage non-

Flu shot vaccine delayed

By JAMIE BARRETT
Kansas State Collegian

Influenza vaccinations will not be available for K-State students until the first part of November, said Carol Kennedy, director for health education and promotion for Lafene Health Center.

"The vaccine has been delayed because there has been a difficulty in the development of it," Kennedy said.

Kennedy said Lafene should receive the vaccine in two to three weeks, and students who are at the highest risk for the flu will receive the vaccine first.

"Asthmatic students and students with types of kidney diseases will receive the vaccine before others," she said. "We have to reserve it for who needs it the most."

Kennedy said Lafene gave out 1,500 vaccines last year, with 150 vaccines given out at their health fair. The delay in the vaccine development prevented vaccines from being given at this year's health fair, which was last week.

Common symptoms for the flu are coughing, chest congestion, achy muscles, fatigue and headaches. Kennedy said students who know they are at high risk should call Lafene and make appointments as soon as the vaccine comes in.

"The flu season normally hits around December, January and February," Kennedy said. "When we receive it in November, there should be plenty time for students to come and get it taken care of."

Union Plaza still site of free speech

By MAGGIE BLUNK
Kansas State Collegian

The area between the K-State Student Union and Seaton Hall now might be known as the Union Plaza, but it still remains the campus free-speech zone.

Loleta Sump, facilities support service manager, said the area has not been released to the state by the contractors. Consequently, she said she was unsure whether the rules of the "free speech" area would stay the same.

"In terms of policy and ground usage, that will stay the same," she said. "The change will be vehicles driving through."

Sump said there still will be an area for emergency vehicles to pass through, but regular vehicles no longer will have that luxury.

The majority of the users of the free-speech area are registered student organizations, she said.

"Based on the requests I've gotten, I think the area will be used more," she said. "The feedback I've received is that it is large, it looks nice and it is nicely landscaped."

Besides taking reservations, Sump said she works closely with the Union.

Willie goes AWOL

K-State mascot Willie the Wildcat is taken from Pant the Chant on Wednesday evening at Ahearn Field House while performing a skit that poked fun of the movie "The Matrix."

Homecoming competition draws crowd to Ahearn

By ALYSON RALETZ
Kansas State Collegian

Four white males wearing ski masks allegedly abducted Willie the Wildcat during the Pant the Chant competition on Wednesday at 6:30 p.m. in Ahearn Field House.

Willie was in the middle of a skit when the males pushed him out of the building.

Matt Killingsworth, senior in public relations and advertising, witnessed the event.

"I saw them just grab Willie and go," Killingsworth said. "I really have no idea if it was staged or if he really was kidnapped."

Megan McPheter, freshman in marketing, attended Pant the Chant. She said she did not know why anyone would kidnap Willie or why there was a streaker in the middle of the event.

"It was shocking at first, but it didn't really surprise me that someone would go to that extent to get a little attention," she said.

Aside from Willie's abduction, many other aspects made this year's Pant the Chant a pivotal point in K-State's Homecoming week.

Students, faculty and community members gathered for the traditional competition between greek houses, residence halls and the Black Student Union.

Abby Hall, sophomore in public relations, said her favorite part of Pant the Chant was the crowd's excitement. She said the chants before the event began got everyone energized for the upcoming competition.

"It was like this force that built and built and once it got started, it exploded," Hall said.

Ford, Haymaker, Smith and Smurthwaite won the residence hall competition. Their routine included imitations of pop stars such as Britney Spears and the Backstreet Boys.

Members of Delta Delta Delta, Lambda Chi Alpha and Delta Chi cheer after winning the greek division of Pant the Chant on Wednesday at Ahearn Field House.

Delta Delta Delta, Lambda Chi Alpha and Delta Chi won the greek division. They entertained the crowd with lyrics from "Staying' Alive" and "Ghostbusters."

Challie Deniston, freshman in accounting, said she was confident their group would be successful.

"We knew we would be in the top three," Deniston said. "It was an honor to be in first place."

McPheter said the routine was difficult because of how technical and precise everything had to be. They put in a lot of long hours, she said.

"About a week and a half ago, we started having one- to two-hour practices every night," McPheter said. "We were there as long as it took to get the routine down."

Deniston said their homecoming partners were cooperative and their efforts were worth it.

"The people in charge put in a lot of hard work," she said. "They did an awesome job and deserve all the credit."

Killingsworth discussed the combination of the greeks, residence halls and Black Student Union. Each organization brings something different to the table, but they all blend really well, Killingsworth said.

Reform, Green parties prepare for elections

WASHINGTON, D.C. — With their concession speeches practically written, Pat Buchanan and Ralph Nader are looking beyond Election Day to the next White House race.

Each is targeting more than a dozen states, as they shoot for at least 5 percent of the vote Nov. 7, the minimum required to draw federal campaign funds for the next election in 2004.

"If we get that, we can build this party into a new conservative party with a permanent presence on the American political scene," said Buchanan, the Reform Party nominee.

Strategies for garnering the necessary votes partially revolve around states where the election outcome is all but certain.

Green Party nominee Nader, for example, is spending the week in Texas, home of Republican George W. Bush, and in California, where Democrat Al Gore has a wide lead in the polls.

"Those are all places where a vote for Gore would be a wasted vote, because he's going to win," said Todd Main, Nader's national field director.

Nader also planned to return to areas where he is popular. That most of these states — Oregon, Michigan, Washington, Minnesota and Wisconsin — are considered toss ups and could affect Vice President Gore's chances of winning are not lost on the Nader campaign.

"There are a lot of people who remain concerned about Ralph taking away votes (from Gore)," said Theresa Amato, Nader's campaign manager. "We're saying that first, we believe everybody has to earn his vote, and that no candidate is simply entitled to the vote."

Buchanan, who left the Republican Party last year to carry the Reform mantle, specifically is targeting states he feels Bush has abandoned or has little chance of capturing. Among them are the same East Coast states being paid visits by Nader.

"In those states, we say a vote for Bush is a wasted vote. He's written off the state," Buchanan said. "We're urging Republicans and conservatives to not waste their vote on Bush but to cast a vote that counts. That vote can do something. A vote for Bush isn't going to do anything but go into the trash can."

Buchanan said he planned to use about $9 million from the Reform Party coffers to blanket his targeted states with radio and television ads.

American abroad faces illegal-weapon charges

MOSCOW — After six months of detention, U.S. businessman Edmond Pope went on trial in a Moscow court Wednesday on charges he illegally bought secret weapons technology.

Pope has maintained his innocence. The United States has called repeatedly for him to be released, and warned that the case could discourage American investment in Russia. Russian officials said the U.S. criticism was meddling in Russia's legal system.

Pope, a retired Navy officer from State College, Pa., was arrested April 3 by Russia's Federal Security Service on charges that he tried to buy plans for a high-speed Russian torpedo, the Shkval. He faces up to 20 years in prison if convicted.

Pope's supporters and family say he was seeking information on an underwater propulsion system that is at least 10 years old and already has been sold abroad.

But the Russians say the Shkval underwater missile is leading-edge Russian military technology. The missile glides on huge air bubbles it creates as it goes along, and can build up speeds of hundreds of miles per hour.

Pope's lawyer, Pavel Astakhov, said his client was pessimistic about the outcome of the trial, expected to last four weeks.

The judge also agreed Wednesday to an independent medical examination to determine whether Pope, who has suffered from a rare form of bone cancer, was healthy enough to remain in prison.

Barkina ordered the defense recommend by Friday what doctors they wanted to examine Pope. Astakhov said he would insist on an American doctor — a request that has been denied up to now.

"Otherwise, it will be another farce, another fiction, as has already happened many times when a doctor on duty in Lefortovo, after examining Edmond Pope, concluded that he was healthy despite his oncological diagnosis," Astakhov said.

The bone cancer was in remission when he was arrested. His wife, Cheryl, has visited her husband several times in Moscow, and said she fears the cancer has returned.

Pope worked for the Applied Research Laboratory at Pennsylvania State University. He later founded CERF Technologies International, a company specializing in studying foreign maritime equipment, and traveled to Russia often.

The U.S. House of Representatives approved a nonbinding resolution last week urging the Clinton administration to link future aid to Russia to Pope's release.

Harald Prins, professor of anthropology, will appear as an expert witness in a case to win back property for the Mi'kmaq tribal communities against the government next month. The Her Majesty v. Drew case looks to deteriorate the Mi'kmaq's land from 18,000 square kilometers to about one mile, stripping the Indians of their original hunting and fishing areas.

Professor works with tribe to win back property, rights

By ANGIE JOHNSON
Kansas State Collegian

Traveling to Canada twice a year is not abnormal for Harald Prins, professor of anthropology.

Prins is actively engaged in the American Indian rights struggle, and is involved in a land claim case that strives to win back property for the Mi'kmaq tribal communities.

"I am very sincere about this particular case, because I know what is correct, and that the Indians should own the land that has been taken away," Prins said.

The case Her Majesty v. Drew seeks to break down the Mi'kmaq's land from more than 18,000 square kilometers to about a mile. This deprives the American Indians of all of their original hunting and fishing areas.

"The community is now getting denied, arrested and thrown in jail for hunting and fishing without a license, which is simply exercising their old hunting rights, and this is wrong," Prins said.

Over the summer, Prins prepared a large expert witness report for the tribe and appeared for two days in a Canadian court two weeks ago.

Next month, he will be cross-examined for four days by attorneys representing the royal Canadian crown and government.

"This man has put lots of time and effort and worked hours on end, going through many volumes of Old French material, in order to prepare for this," Martin Ottenheimer, professor of anthropology, said.

"He is proving how anthropologists can help people, and I am sure that he will only include the information that is important and pertinent in the case."

Besides this case, Prins has written numerous articles and books and devoted a large amount of time to Indian rights. In 1999, Prins served as the tribe's expert witness in a fishing rights dispute in Newfoundland's provincial court.

"The judge at the end of the case said that it was both funny and strange to have a Dutch professor come to Newfoundland to tell the United States about our history," Prins said.

Prins has a passion for teaching truth and said he enjoys researching and learning background, which is his task as a scholar. In the large case he is involved with, he said he strongly believes the tribe is correct.

"It is my job to be critical of bias and subjectivity. No matter how it resolves, I would never have the audacity to fly all the way down there and tell a lie," Prins said.

Until the court makes a decision, Prins will spend time in Canada being questioned and interrogated.

"If truth prevails and justice is done, the tribe will win," he said.

Grave of Civil War Congressional Medal of Honor winner found

By TRAVIS HOCHARD
Kansas State Collegian

A Fort Riley soldier has discovered the grave of a Civil War Congressional Medal of Honor winner.

No one knew the name of this long lost soldier or where he was buried, but when Lt. John Luerding heard a rumor that a Civil War hero was buried in an unmarked grave in Riley County, he had to do something about it.

"It was my goal to either prove or disprove this rumor," Luerding said. "I knew that it would be a tremendous injustice if this man was buried without the recognition he deserves."

Scott Price, a local historian and community relations officer at Fort Riley, received a phone call about the rumor early last March.

"It was a gentleman from Manhattan," Price said. "I wrote his name and number on a notepad and put it in my pocket, but my wife washed my pants and his name remains a mystery."

Price said he was so intrigued by the story that he passed it on to Luerding, who began to investigate.

"As an officer, it is my job to take care of soldiers," Luerding said. "This just happened to be a very old one."

The only thing Luerding knew was the first name of the soldier's wife-Lucinda. He started by checking the phone book for all cemeteries in the Manhattan area. He called Sunset Cemetery first, and asked for any records with the first name Lucinda.

The sexton of Sunset Cemetery told him that John Callahan had purchased three plots for $3 each at the time of his wife Lucinda's death in 1907, and that she is buried in one of those plots.

Luerding searched the Internet for Congressional Medal of Honor winners, and found that a John Callahan had indeed earned the medal. He then contacted Price, who provided him with a list of members of the Grand Army of the Republic — similar to the American Legion — and found that Callahan had been a member at Lew Gove Post No. 100 in Manhattan.

"It was a one in a million chance that I would find her the first place I checked," Luerding said.

On one of the hottest days of the year, Luerding, his wife and son went searching for Lucinda's grave. 2 1/2 hours later his son called out that he had found her.

CALLAHAN

"I was all knees and elbows running over there," Luerding said. "I had a warm gut feeling that we had found the right one."

Callahan enlisted in the army Aug. 13, 1862, at Scottville, Ill. He earned the Congressional Medal of Honor when he captured the Confederate battle flag at Fort Blakely, Ala., on April 9, 1865. That same year, he left the army and moved to Manhattan, where he became a pioneer resident. When Callahan died in 1914, his son was on trial for perjury and used his family money trying to defend himself.

This is the most likely reason why Callahan's grave was not properly marked, according to research provided by the Riley County Historical Society.

Lois Lewis, Callahan's great-granddaughter, was unaware that her great-grandfather was buried in Manhattan.

"It's strange that after all of these years I never knew that he was buried just a few blocks away," Lewis said.

Price and Luerding have sent a request for a government-issued tombstone with the Congressional Medal of Honor inscribed into it. The dedication of the tombstone is planned for Memorial Day 2001.

Civil War re-enactors will play music and fire a 21-gun solute. Luerding will present a military burial flag to Lewis, who will then present it to a representative from Fort Blakely Park, Ala.

"It is fitting and proper that we finally say thank you to this man who risked his life to save our great country," Price said.

Take advantage of time allotted for fall break

Top 10 ways to take advantage of fall break —

10. Sleep in on Friday without feeling guilty about skipping any classes.

9. Start getting pumped for K-State's victory over the Red Raiders.

8. Grill outside and have friends over. Unfortunately, this nice weather is going to end all too soon.

7. Put together your own football team with your buddies.

6. Write a letter to the editor instead of calling the Campus Fourum.

5. Use the day off to catch up on all of the homework you have been missing. Yes, even those assignments from the beginning of the semester.

4. Take advantage of the local parks to go and take a nice nap.

3. Attend Friday's Homecoming parade. Remember to get your seats early — yet another reason to head to Aggieville.

2. Call in well to work. After all, it is your day off.

1. Redo Thursday's crossword puzzle. Cross your fingers and hope we have the right answers in Monday's paper.

Pastor follows through on beliefs with actions for rights of homosexual clergy

MIAH WHITAKER

ADAM HAYES/Collegian

Homosexuality is a hot topic all over America. It seems that everywhere you turn, someone has an opinion on it. People who never have even met someone who was a homosexual have voiced strong opinions, based solely on misinformation and prejudice.

Everyone has an opinion, but the number of people who actually do something about it is far less. How many of you have done more than state your view, regardless of what it is? How many of you actually have protested against unfair policies, such as the one the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America has against active clergy with same-sex lifelong partners?

I know of at least one person who has and who will continue to do so in her own way until the ELCA's policy has changed. Pastor Jayne Thompson, campus pastor of the Lutheran Campus Ministry at K-State, has been doing what she can to publicly support gay and lesbian clergy since fall 1998.

On Reformation Sunday in October 1998, Thompson put away her stoles and pledged to wear a rainbow stole until the ELCA's policy against removing clergy involved in lifelong same-sex relationships was changed. She still wears the rainbow stole, two years later.

"I suppose, after a long, prayerful consideration, it seemed to me one thing I could do to publicly stand against the policy in the ELCA that prevents partnered sexually minority clergy from serving as pastors," Thompson said.

"I guess that I know so many people who have been removed, so many either gay or lesbian clergy who have been removed or who are in the closet and are really afraid. "

She told me there are others all over the country — Washington state, Minnesota, Illinois — who are doing something similar. Other campus ministers are doing their part to combat a policy many see as unfair.

The ELCA does allow gay and lesbian clergy to serve, as long as they agree to a vow of abstinence. This is the same vow the ELCA asks of single heterosexual clergy. It's only when members of the clergy meet someone they wish to spend the rest of their lives with that there becomes a difference.

"We have said in the ELCA — we have said this since 1991 — that gay and lesbian people, as individuals created by God, are welcome to participate fully in the congregations of the ELCA. But, to the mind of some people, which includes myself, fully only means partly for the pastors," Thompson said.

When a heterosexual member of the clergy falls in love and gets married, that's OK. When homosexual members of the clergy fall in love and begin permanent faithful relationships, they are no longer allowed to be active clergy. They are defrocked.

I commend the ELCA for the steps it's already taken to make the homosexual and bisexual population feel more welcome. But now is not the time to stop, not when it's already done so much.

"There are gay and lesbian people, and bisexual and transgendered, in every community on campus. Every faith community. Although, I suspect that statistically ... their numbers would be less than reflected with the rest of the population because they don't feel welcome," Thompson said.

"And it doesn't only affect them, but it affects their families, their parents, their grandparents, aunts, uncles and cousins. It affects their friends, the people who care about them. And so we're not talking about just 10 percent of the population — we're talking about a huge amount of people who don't feel welcome in most churches."

Thompson does what she can to make everyone feel welcome. She strives to promote understanding with Bible studies, group discussions and counseling. The Lutheran Campus Ministry was involved in the spring semester's Stop the Hate Vigil.

Thompson is doing something about an issue she strongly believes in. Whether you agree with what she's fighting for or not, you can't fault her for her efforts.

"I kind of think it's my responsibility. And, plus, I think it's really a matter of mercy and justice that we do it. I mean, it's about the gospel. All those things, I think, make it part of my job.

I think it will change if enough of us do our little part. My part is just a little part, but to do nothing is to be part of the problem. It will never change if people say, 'Well, somebody else will deal with this.'"

Student Union remolding mirrors 1994 requests

CHRISTINA JANNEY

Looking around the new K-State Student Union, I wonder if I did the right thing.

As an undergraduate, I voted in favor of the 1994 fee increase that made the renovation possible. I have returned to K-State to pursue a master's degree. I never thought I would be reaping any benefits from that decision, nor did I think I would be paying for them.

I combed through old Collegian stories to determine if what I was seeing matched what we were promised. In many, but not all cases, the ideas envisioned in the planning were made realities.

What to call this project should be clarified. During the referendum, the project was called "Union expansion" because plans called for adding space to the building. That did not happen, but the Union used its resources to maximize existing space.

The Union Food Court was a big selling point for me, as I usually ate one meal a day in the Union. I still do. In 1994, revenue for Union food service was plummeting, and it had to raise prices to accommodate.

Many students feared franchises in the Union would mean the loss of nutritious dining options. It hasn't. The salad bar and sandwich areas have improved. I can still enjoy Call Hall ice cream, and a hot, non-greasy meal at Market Carvery. The franchises have brought choices.

Some students complain about the decor of the new dining area, but it is much improved over the old rooms. If you want to get a taste, go look at the carpet in the arcade on the ground floor.

I look forward to outside dining, but I don't like Union Plaza overall. It looks like a helipad. At the time of the referendum, students expressed concerns about green space in that area. I don't think they envisioned this.

Cats' Den is convenient for me. You can pick up food and necessities there more quickly than in the food court or K-State Union Bookstore. However, the store should have longer hours. It was designed so it could be open when the Union was not.

Infrastructure was my second greatest concern. I knew if the Union was to be preserved for future students, its guts needed some attention. The Collegian then was writing lovely stories about sewage breaks and asbestos. These needs were addressed in the renovation.

The improvement of the fire safety system was of particular importance. The Union created safe zones for disabled patrons near the elevators, because it is unsafe to use elevators during a fire. The doors in these zones automatically seal, the walls are fire resistant and the areas have alarms to alert rescuers someone is trapped. The Union also increased accessibility in the Little Theatre.

However, serious accessibility issues were neglected in Forum Hall. Wheelchair access is only available through a fire door that opens to the outside of the Union. That door usually is locked and the alarm engaged during business hours. There is a bump at that threshold that could tip over a wheelchair. People who use wheelchairs can only sit right in from of the stage, and no sign at the main entrance directs wheelchair users to the accessible door.

Students can watch the news, soaps or whatever on three large screen televisions in the Union. However, I was greatly disappointed the TV room was taken out and not replaced. I know that was a favorite place for many students to congregate.

I have even greater displeasure that Union Station now is void of food service. A club in which beer could be sold on campus was an idea that had been tossed around during early planning. Union Station had been eyed for that purpose by supporters of that concept.

The Union has not delivered on its promises of more retail outlets in the Union. The food court, the hair salon and Commerce Bank were added, but businesses such as a flower shop, travel agency, dry cleaner or music store were also proposed. However, what is in that space will be more beneficial to students. Multicultural student organizations are located on the second floor perhaps to soon be joined by KSDB-FM 91.9.

The big hole in the renovation is shared office space for student organizations or what is now being called the student activities center. When this office space was a part of the bigger project, I thought it was justifiable. I still think it could be a good project, but I question if it is worth the additional expense.

Eleven of 24 improvements from a 1994 Union wish list for the renovation were achieved. That sounds pretty bad, but I knew when I voted we weren't going to be able to afford everything that we wanted. I had some disappointments in the results, but if I were to cast my ballot in that referendum again, I would vote yes.

READERS WRITE

Column from cow viewpoint offends students, industry

Editor,

I am writing in regards to the column "Beef: Its Not What's For Dinner," which was featured in the opinion section of the Wednesday's paper. I do not know exactly what the writer of this column was trying to express with this style of writing, but I for one am personally offended by this display that badmouths an industry that is important to me and this state.

Many people on this campus share my view and are concerned about columns such at this, which directly attack the way of life that we lead and how we can make a living. Whether this column was intended to be a direct slap in the face to cattlemen, ranchers, meat processors and Kansas agriculture in general, it is not quite clear to me.

I understand everyone is entitled to have their opinion, and in this country express it freely, but it is bad publicity, such as this column, that sets back work that people in the cattle industry do to promote their product.

Cattle production for both meat and milk is important to the Kansas economy. Livestock in general, but cattle especially, convert a food source to usable products for humans, that we can't do ourselves. These products are used in many ways and include such things as meat, milk, leather, pharmaceuticals and many other products.

I feel it is a shame that this valuable conversion of forage into a useful product, that cattle provide, has been belittled and insulted in Wednesday's paper.

The way that I interpreted the column might be way off base, but I am disappointed in how it was used. The title itself is troubling to me. It is not my intent to degrade anyone, or to say that everyone has to eat red meat in large quantities, but I feel that the negative image this column displays of the beef industry was offensive to many people in the cattle industry.

The writers or writer of the column should think about who they affect by printing material like they did Wednesday. I want to apologize now if this column was just a joke, but I for one did not find any humor in it, and I think many people in agriculture would agree with me.

New governor takes office in wake of Carnahan crash

By DOUG JOHNSON
Associated Press Writer

GOLDMAN, Mo. — The remains of Gov. Mel Carnahan and his chief aide, both of whom died in a plane crash, were identified early Wednesday by the Jefferson County Medical Examiner's Office.

The examiner was working to identify the third victim, believed to be Carnahan's son Roger, 44.

With the identifications made, Lt. Gov. Roger Wilson officially was sworn in as the state's 52nd governor shortly after 1 a.m. Wednesday at the Capitol in Jefferson City.

Joe Bednar, the governor's legal counsel, said that as acting governor, Wilson already had authority as chief executive, but that Carnahan's wife, Jean, and other family members agreed with formally making Wilson governor, to make sure he has as seamless a transition as possible.

"The people of Missouri have my pledge that I will do everything I can in the remaining 2 1/2 months to make Missouri as productive as possible and a great place to live," Wilson said.

A team of investigators from the National Transportation Safety Board searched the crash scene Tuesday.

Wreckage was spread over a large, densely wooded area. Pieces of the plane were being hauled to a nearby National Guard armory as part of the investigation.

NTSB workers also went up in a Missouri State Highway Patrol helicopter to retrace the plane's path, while other investigators tracked witness accounts and weather and radar data.

The FAA tower at Lambert Field lost contact with the twin-engine Cessna 335 airplane at 7:32 p.m.

A spokeswoman for the FAA said Carnahan's plane was flying at 6,500 feet when the pilot reported a gyro problem. A gyroscope on an airplane is a dashboard instrument that helps the pilot with basic orientation and sense of horizon.

The plane disappeared from radar a short time later, spokeswoman Elizabeth Isham Cory said.

The craft had a clean track record, as did Roger Carnahan, an amateur pilot with 1,600-plus hours of flying experience.

Ted Lopatkiewicz, a spokesman for the NTSB, said an air traffic control investigator in St. Louis was listening to audio tapes of the exchange between the pilot and controllers.

The deaths also cast a pall over the third presidential debate between Vice President Al Gore and Texas Gov. George W. Bush in St. Louis.

Also, the bitterness which had marked the campaign between Carnahan and Republican Sen. John Ashcroft — the two were in a statistical dead heat in recent polls — dropped abruptly after Ashcroft learned of the crash.

Carnahan's name will remain on the Nov. 7 ballot because the deadline for changing it was Oct. 13, Secretary of State Bekki Cook said.

If more voters cast ballots for Carnahan than Ashcroft Nov. 7, the seat would become vacant when Ashcroft's term ends Jan. 3, Cook said.

Wilson, a Democrat, then could appoint a senator to fill the vacancy through the November 2002 general election, when the seat would be up for election, Cook said.

Carnahan's casket will lie in state at the governor's mansion Thursday for public visitation.

The son of a seven-term congressman, Carnahan won his first public election at age 26, as a municipal judge in his hometown of Rolla. He was elected to the Missouri House two years later and served two terms before becoming state treasurer.

In 1988, Carnahan was elected lieutenant governor. Four years later, he won the governor's office in a landslide and was re-elected in 1996.

Nebraska takes out Cats in 3-win streak

Nebraska's volleyball team was everything K-State expected — and more.

The Cats expected the No. 1 Huskers to serve well, and Nebraska didn't let them down, slowing the speedy K-State offense the entire match with aggressive service play in K-State's 9-15, 6-15, 8-15 loss.

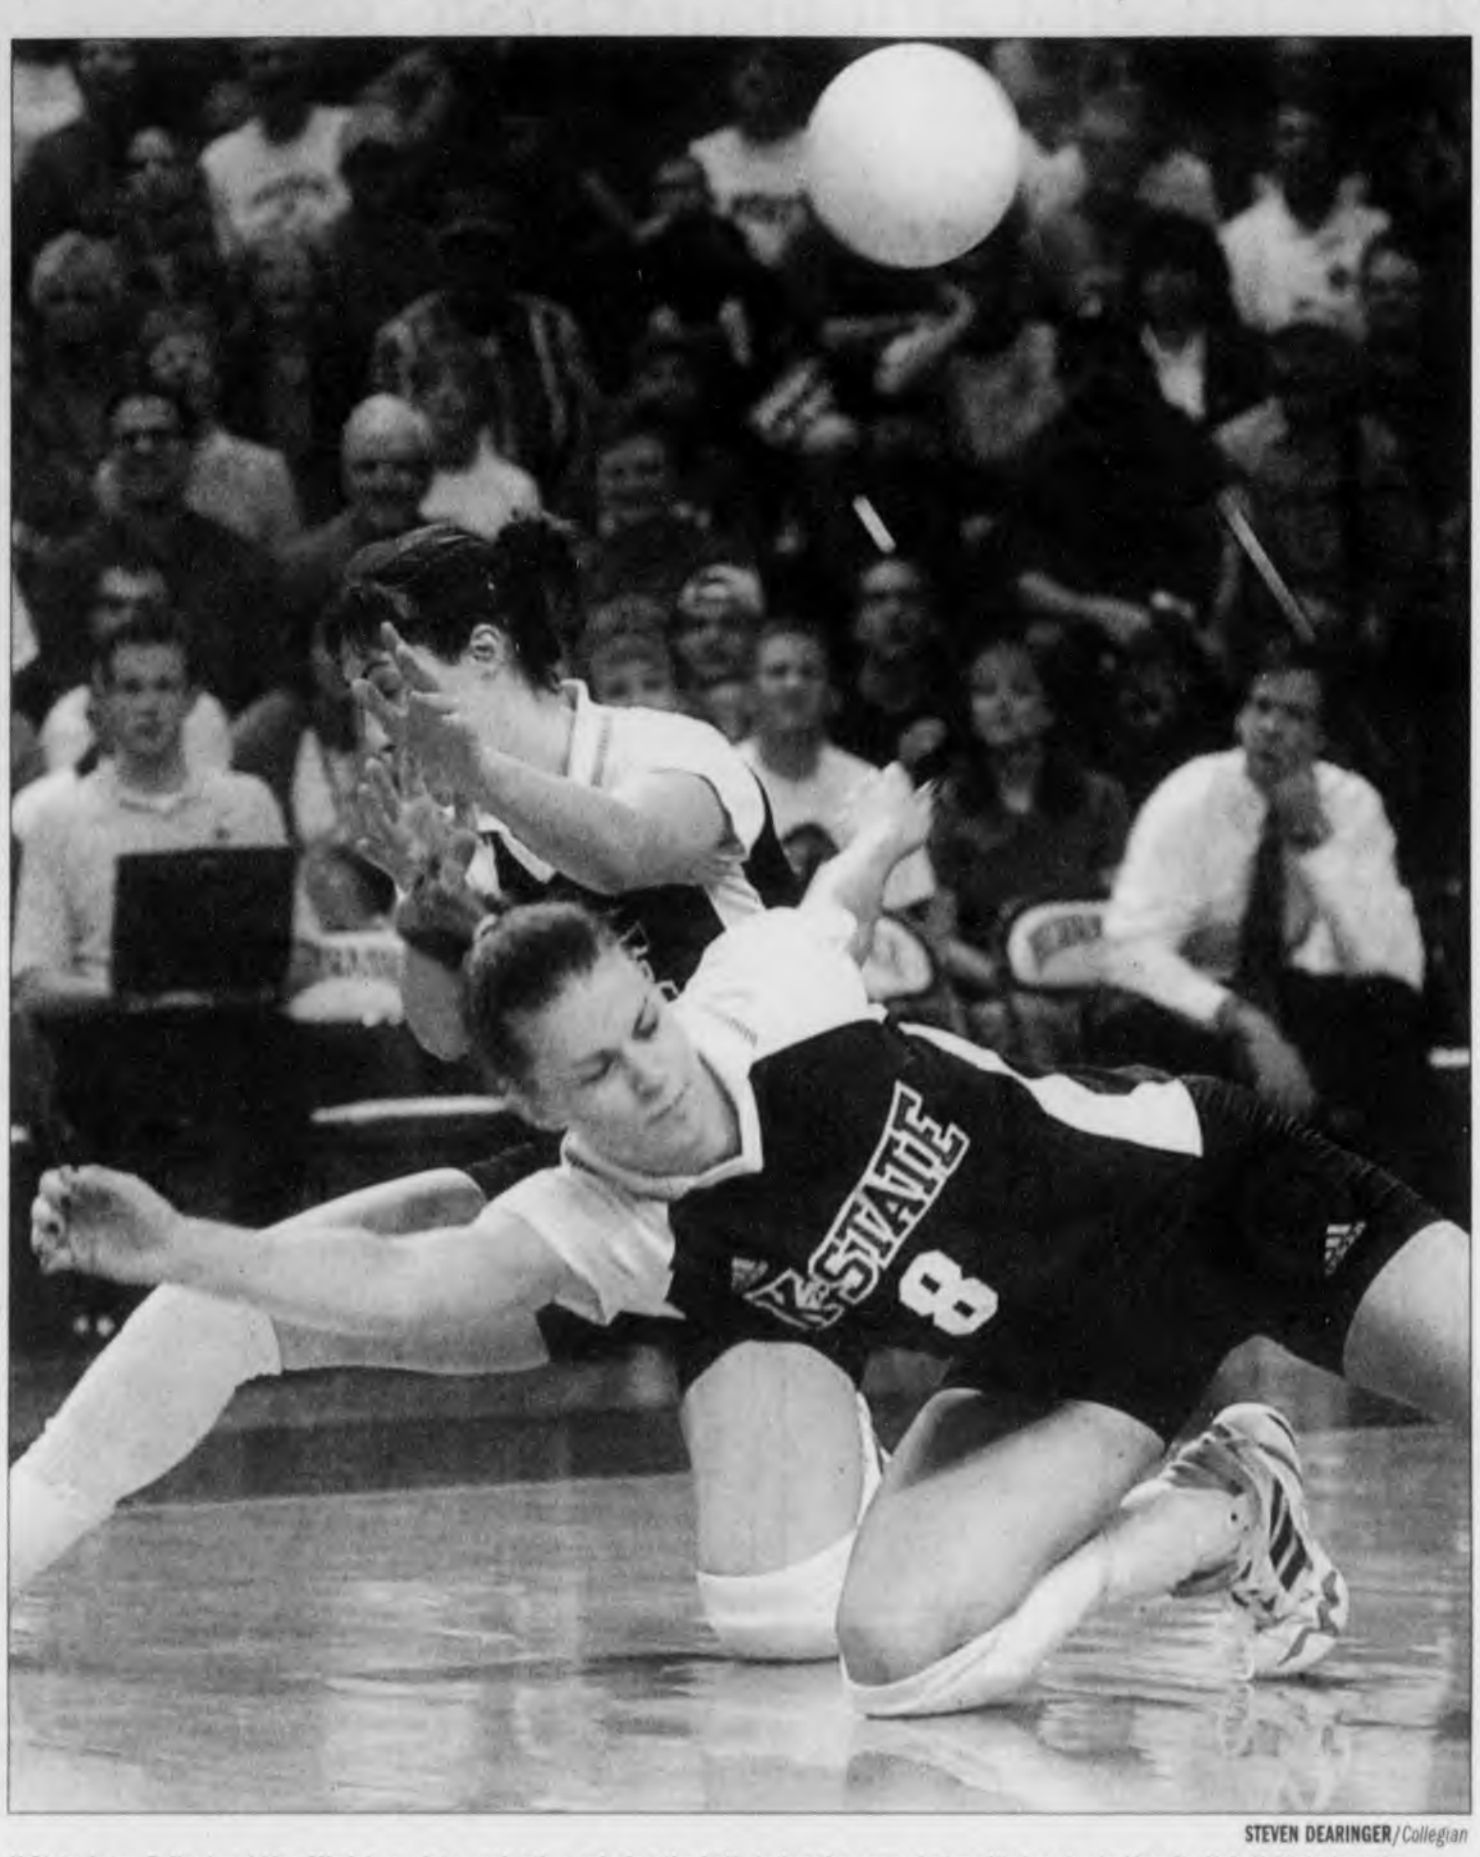
UP NEXT

K-State returns to action Saturday versus Iowa State at 1 p.m. at Ahearn Field House.

The Cats also expected the Huskers, who didn't start a player shorter than 6 feet, to get blocks, and they did, racking up 16 total rejections.

What K-State did not expect was for the tallest team in Nebraska history to also be quicker than the year before, K-State head coach Jim McLaughlin said.

"They covered a lot of balls for a big team," he said. "They look a little bit faster behind the block, and they're bigger than I've seen a Nebraska team. I like their position, and I like their first step. Being big is probably the most important thing when it comes to blocking, but being in the right position — wow."



The Cats fell behind early at 3-1, which was followed shortly by a five-point Husker streak to put K-State behind 10-2. K-State rallied to 12-8, but Nebraska put the first game away at 15-9.

The second game also contained a five-point Nebraska run to bring the score to11-3. The Cats managed to fight back to 12-6 but stopped there as the Huskers grabbed their final three points.

While the Cats came closest to their first lead in the match in the third game by tying the score at 8, Nebraska finished the third and final game of the match with seven straight points.

Nebraska shut down the K-State offense with blocks, but if the Cats had followed their game

Ill centers stall hopes for NBA season

MIKE VIETTI

I know it's a few weeks before the NBA season kicks off, but I thought I'd get everybody started with some layup drills, since everything about pro basketball is fantastic!

In all actuality, the NBA season doesn't start for another seven or eight months (the playoffs), but that doesn't mean that we can't have fun watching those early season Clippers-Grizzlies games, now does it?

Well, you got me on that one, but something that's even more depressing than that is the fact that there are hardly any more good centers in the league.

That stupid Paula Cole song, "Where Have All the Cowboys Gone?" has been in my head for a few days (any doctors out there willing to perform a lobotomy for free?), and all it takes is a little snip here, and you've got "Where Have All the Centers Gone?"

For starters, two are out because of illness. Miami's Alonzo Mourning is out for the season with a kidney disease some suspect is the result of taking anti-inflammatories. Guess who another person is that takes that drug? That's right, the most dominating player in the NBA — Shaq-Fu himself.

If he were to go down, the league should just shut down until it could get someone besides Duane Causwell to fill in. But back to that disease thing, the Hawks' Dikembe Mutombo will be sidelined for at least two or three weeks with malaria. I thought we cured that one decades ago, but I guess not.

Toss in the retirement of Rik Smits and the NBA is left with guys like Ervin Johnson and Jim McIlvaine still starting. Want to know how bad the center position is right now — Golden State just cut Yinka Dare the other day. Yinka Dare, for God's sake!

Here's a little nugget the Collegian research department came up with: if you combine the scoring averages of all six centers in the Atlantic Division, you get roughly 38 points per game, and that's tossing in Philly's Theo Ratliff's 11.9 points per game. He's only 6-foot-10-inches, 225 pounds and should be playing power forward.

That collective total is slightly more than eight points per game more than Shaq by himself. What — you're saying that someone in that group could have a breakout year?

Hmm ... let me think about that one — no chance in hell. Here's the starting lineup of centers in the Atlantic: Boston — Vitaly Potapenko (can he ever stay healthy — nope), New Jersey — Jim McIlvaine (could he even start for Manhattan High?), Orlando — Luc Longley (the savvy veteran of the bunch), Philadelphia — Ratliff (power forward playing center), Washington —Jahidi White (suffers from Oliver Miller disease) and Miami — Causwell (no comment needed).

It's not just the Atlantic, either. There's no real standout in the Central other than Cleveland's Chris Mihm, and he hasn't even played a game yet. During the off season, several teams got into a bidding war for the services of Chicago's Brad Miller. Who? He's the guy who helped the Hornets out by averaging a whopping 7.7 points per game last season.

Zo and Shaq are really the only superstar centers left in the NBA, and now Zo is toast for at least a year. Of course, there's a few guys close behind like David Robinson and aging towers Hakeem Olajuwon and Patrick Ewing.

Then there's the next tier with guys like Denver's Raef LaFrentz, Sacramento's Vlade Divac and maybe the Grizzlies' Bryant Reeves.

But that's about it, which begs the question: Where have all the centers gone?

Who knows, but maybe we'll have to start pulling guys out of retirement. I'm betting Bill Russell or Kareem Abdul-Jabbar could take Jahidi White on a post move or two.

This quite possibly could be our only chance to get Bill Walton out of broadcasting — maybe this isn't too shabby of a thing after all?

Equestrian members to begin English riding

By STEVEN DEARINGER
Kansas State Collegian

K-State's English equestrian team starts its season this weekend at Oklahoma State University with a three hunter event.

English riding, unlike the western division of the sport, is more formal — almost like the style used in fox hunting.

"In western, they have flashy shirts, where as English is more conservative and everyone dresses the same," said Kara Jagels, reserve high point rider at last year's regional competition. "They are judging us on how you look on the horse, form, and how you are sitting."

English also has slight differences with saddles and riding techniques as well.

"It's a forward-sit riding," Mary Ann Thomas Funk, English equestrian coach, said. "It's designed to ride fast and jump fences. There's a lot flatter saddle ride with two hands on reigns versus one."

As in western, riders are judged on a point system, from one to six, based on how well they ride. There are six classes: walk trot, beginning walk trot canter, advanced walk trot canter, novice, intermediate and open.

The main difference between English and western riding is that in the upper classes of English, starting with novice, contestants must jump six to eight fences, ranging in height from 2 feet 6 inches to 3 feet 3 inches.

K-State's 30 riders have been working since September preparing for this first meet.

"I think the girls have made great progress over the last four weeks," Funk said, "and the effort has been tremendous."

Vegetarianism gaining popularity in America

By SARAH MCCAFFREY
Kansas State Collegian

It's October, a time for fall, football, Halloween — and vegetables.

October is Vegetarian Awareness Month.

For some, it's an ethical decision; for others it's a health-related issue. It even can be a choice based on economics. No matter the reason, Lige Weill, president of the Vegetarian Awareness Network, said vegetarianism is a trend that is gaining popularity in America.

"Younger people are more into it than older people," Weill said. "They want to be identified as vegetarians because it's the 'in' thing, the trend."

Weill said many females also are more likely to turn toward a vegetarian diet than males.

He said many students switch to a vegetarian lifestyle because of the health benefits.

"I don't eat meat because I feel like it's a healthier lifestyle," Janet Jester, junior in psychology, said.

Some of the health advantages of eating a vegetarian diet include higher energy levels, more endurance, weight loss, a decreased chance of certain diseases and a lower threat of food contamination, Weill said.

Amie Kershner, senior in public relations and political science, said she has abstained from eating red meat for the past two years. She said health reasons contributed to eliminating red meat from her diet.

"It's higher in fat content. It ups your cholesterol," she said.

"Too much meat can lead to heart disease."

Many people who consider switching to a vegetarian diet are worried they won't be able to get nutrients that are provided from meat.

"A well-planned diet provides all of the essential nutrients," Weill said.

Vegetarians can choose to take daily vitamins and iron supplements to replace what they would be getting from meat consumption, he said.

Health concerns are not the only reasons many students prefer a vegetarian diet.

"There are not only personal benefits, but also more planetary benefits," Weill said.

He said many people cite world hunger as a reason for the decision to go vegetarian.

"It's a lot more efficient to feed the grain directly to the people rather than to animals," Weill said.

Emily Sharp, senior in English and political science, said one of the reasons she chose to be a vegetarian was related to humanitarian issues.

"Farming operations takes up only so much land mass," Sharp said. "There's enough land mass in the world to support everyone eating a vegetarian diet."

In many situations, Weill said it is cheaper to eat a vegetarian diet than one rich in meat. It takes less energy to produce vegetarian food than meat, which in turn, decreases the price to the consumer.

Although vegetarian staples might be cheaper, Kershner said they sometimes are hard to find in Manhattan.

"It doesn't cater to vegetarians," she said. "It's still Midwestern. A lot of the area runs around agriculture."

The recent addition of Mercado Gourmet Grocery in Aggieville is trying to make Manhattan more vegetarian friendly, manager Jennifer McAnarney said.

Most of the products the store carries could be considered vegetarian, she said, luding pastas, rice and salad dressings that are vegetarian friendly.

Weill said vegetarianism tends to be more popular on the coasts.

"It's an East and West coast thing compared to the rest of the country," he said. "I think the West coast tends to be more progressive, not only in lifestyle but for other issues."

Kershner, who interned in Washington, D.C., over the summer, found that the East Coast is much more accommodating to vegetarians than the Midwest.

"It's a big trend," she said. "When I was on the East Coast, you had to search to find a steak house there."

Types of Vegetarians:

Semi-vegetarians
People who eat no red meat, but their diet might include fish, poultry, dairy, eggs and plant foods.

Lacto-ovo-vegetarians
People who eat only dairy, eggs and plant foods.

Lacto-vegetarians
People who eat only dairy and plant foods.

Ovo-vegetarians
People who eat only eggs and plant foods.

Vegans
People who eat only plant foods. They avoid the use of all animal by-products, including eggs, honey and lard, and all animal products, including leather, wool and fur.

plan, they would have scored with more shots, McLaughlin said.

"Maybe their identity is their left-side strength blocking. They defended as well as anybody I've seen," he said. "We kind of knew we couldn't get into a left-side battle with them, and we did. And they controlled us. They're big, and you've got to make them move. If you give them some things to think about, that reduces reaction time.

"I think they were thinking about one thing, and they were looking at us on the left side."

Of course, the Cats still could have seen success on the left if they had attacked the blocks correctly, outside hitter Jenny Pollard, who totaled 10 kills and 16 digs, said.

"They get over the net, so one way to be successful is to hit it high and hit it flat so it hits off their hands," she said. "When you play a team like Nebraska that blocks so well, you've just got to step up and hit it high and challenge the block."

STEVEN DEARINGER/Collegian

K-State Julie Thomas bumps the ball Wednesday night in Lincoln, Neb. K-State lost the game in three straight sets.

Because they hit the ball into the blocker's hands instead of off the tips of their fingers, the Cats had the ball shoved back at them, and, as a result, became less aggressive on offense, McLaughlin said.

"They blocked some balls, and I thought we got a little bit gun-shy," he said. "We tried to avoid them a little bit and made some unforced errors."

When K-State did eventually begin to develop offensive rhythm, it often quickly got caught by service errors. Those errors, nine in all, weren't particularly numerous, but they did always seem to come at inopportune times, McLaughlin said.

The first game in the match was marred by five service errors, and in the third game, K-State tied Nebraska at 8-8 with two straight scoring plays but killed the momentum by missing two serves in a row.

"We couldn't get into a good rhythm, and when we did, we'd serve two balls out of bounds," McLaughlin said. "It was just untimely."

That was no surprise to K-State, however. The Cats knew they would be forced to maintain constant pressure against the Huskers, just like they knew the importance of challenging the blockers.

The Cats understood what they had to do to win but were just unable to do it on this particular night, said outside hitter Lisa Mimick, who just missed a double-double with nine kills and 12 digs.

"That's all part of the game, though," she said. "You get blocked some, and you get some kills, too."

FREE SPEECH

"It's like a partnership," said Jack Connaughton, associate director of the Union. "Loleta makes the reservations, and we set up the tables or whatever is needed."

Connaughton said there might be things that evolve in the future, but they are treating the area in the same way as it was before.

The brightly colored cement design and creative landscape has become an open place for student organizations to gather and students to meet.

"I think the area will gain more usage because there isn't a road there anymore," said Carla Jones, associate dean of student life. "I think it'll gain more pedestrian traffic, which is important for campus life."

Gayle Spencer, coordinator of student activities, said an area such as this is essential for the university.

"It's important for us to make this area exist," she said. "It's people's right to have an area that they can speak freely."

Connaughton said that once the entire area is finished, it will be a nice setting and an attractive are for students to relax or have lunch.

"Other than appearance, everything has stayed the same," he said. "We are trying to make it more convenient for people and organizations."

Sump said they had the Opus Band Competition in this area earlier this fall. Other Union officials said if they received more requests for events like concerts, they would try to make them happen.

"There are lots of possibilities," Connaughton said. "I think it'll be trial and error for the first year, but if we go back to the basics, its main use is free speech."

HOMECOMING

"When BSU comes down, they always put on a good show," he said. "With their clapping and stomping, they always have the most spirit and rhythm."

He said the residence halls have their own type of spirit. It was amazing to see the high numbers that attended compared to past years.

"For the amount of people that showed up, they yelled just as, if not louder than, the greeks, which outnumbered them three to one," he said.

Killingsworth said the greeks always have incredible visual presentations with a lot of emotion, he said.

Hall said she was impressed with how supportive everyone was. There was no greek or residence hall bashing, she said.

"I think it has been a greek event for a long time, but with the residence halls and the Black Student Union, it got the campus and more people involved and excited about Homecoming," she said. "That is our goal."

Killingsworth said this is the second year Pant the Chant has been at Ahearn Field House.

"This has been the best Pant the Chant ever because of the sheer size and noise we have ever had from the crowd and performers," he said. "The best part is that we are inside in a contained environment where we can get really loud."

NAPSTER

educational use of Napster.

"For the most part, I think our students don't understand," Unger said. "When they do understand, they are cooperative."

"I'm certainly not criticizing our students at all."

Mike Juliff, freshman in preveterinary medicine, lives in a residence hall. He said he uses Napster once a day and typically downloads about 10 songs each time he accesses the service.

"I've actually started using it more since I've got here, because of the high-speed connections," he said.

Limiting the amount of Napster file-sharing would anger a lot of people, Juliff said. The one-time fee of $150 should grant unlimited access, but he would be willing to pay an extra fee to use Napster.

Unger said the university might consider another residence hall line that would charge students for individual services, but she said she would not be in favor of the additional cost.

"To charge for it would have set the university back, but now we're in the position where students and some faculty are using that resource for ways in which it was never intended," Unger said.

With goals still within reach, Cats aren't planning any more

DAYS LIKE THIS

Quarterback Jonathan Beasley runs past Oklahoma's Derrick Strait for a 15-yard touchdown.

FILE PHOTO BY MATT STAMEY/Collegian

By MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

K-State's offense played poorly last Saturday, but the players aren't worried.

They've seen worse, quarterback Jonathan Beasley said.

"Last year I played a lot worse throughout the season than I did in that one game, so I think I can come back from last week's game," he said.

Wide-out Aaron Lockett said he agreed. All the receivers have endured bad days — maybe not days in which eight passes were dropped, but performances upsetting enough to know how to respond the next week.

"I've played some 30-odd football games, and this was my first one like that," Lockett said. "You let it bypass you. I've put some balls on the ground before, Quincy Morgan and Martez Wesley have put some balls on the ground before, so we'll all bounce back."

To do that, confidence is all that is needed, and the players, especially Beasley, have it. His trust in his receivers will not be lessened by the drops last Saturday, offensive coordinator Ron Hudson said.

"Knowing Jonathan, I don't think it bothered him at all. He knows that people are going to make mistakes," Hudson said. "He knows that he made mistakes on some of those throws. Sometimes those things happen, but I don't think it had an effect mentally on him."

The receivers will still see the usual number of passes, Beasley said.

"It's not like I'm going to come back this week and not throw to those guys, because they got us to where we are right now," he said. "So I'm going to keep going to them."

There shouldn't be a doubt that the debacle against Oklahoma will not be repeated this week because K-State is a team of fighters, Hudson said.

Cats, Red Raiders look to avoid losing streak

By DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

Two teams looking to avenge losses will clash Saturday at KSU Stadium.

Texas Tech (5-2, 1-2), coming off its worst defeat in school history, a 56-3 shellacking at the hands of Nebraska, will take on No. 10/8 K-State (6-1, 2-1), which will be looking to bounce back from a 41-31 loss to Oklahoma.

"They're actually in the same boat," wide-out Aaron Lockett said of the Red Raiders. "I mean, they lost a game that they were expecting to play pretty close, and we did the same.

"So I think we're both coming in with the ambition of winning this game, and we know that we have a lot to prove, not only to each other, but probably to the Big 12 and to the nation," Lockett said. "So we're going to go out, both teams are going to try to execute, and hopefully we can come out on top."

The Cats might have a winning edge after playing the Sooners last weekend, as Oklahoma runs many of the same schemes as Texas Tech on both sides of the football.

Offensively, the Red Raiders boast a passing attack led by Kliff Kingsbury, who set the completion record at Tech earlier this season, connecting on 42 of 55 passes against North Texas.

K-State head coach Bill Snyder said Kingsbury and Tech have a similar offensive package to that of the Sooners, with the exception that the Red Raiders use more motion and have several additional formation options.

Junior free safety Jon McGraw tackles a Louisiana Tech player in a game earlier this season. The Cats take on the Red Raiders at 6 p.m. Saturday.

"It has the components of the Oklahoma offense, as you would expect just because of the nature of the coaching arrangement there," Snyder said of Tech, "and yet it also has maybe more diversity to it at this particular point in time, doing maybe more things."

Junior free safety Jon McGraw said the similarities between the two teams are important in getting ready for Saturday's ball game.

"They do a lot of the same things, as far as spreading the field and getting a lot of wide outs in the game," he said in comparison. "So really, our preparation is going to be similar to Oklahoma, so it's going to be an asset having played them last week going into this game."

Junior linebacker Ben Leber also said playing two similar schematic teams in back-to-back weeks is a plus for a defensive unit.

"It's like almost having a bye-week getting ready for a team. You've got two weeks, pretty much, to prepare for them," he said. "Any time you can get extra time and extra practice plays in on the same offense is great. It should benefit us in the long run, and just help us polish up on the areas that we missed last week."

That polishing will be a feasible task, McGraw said, after watching tape of last weekend's Oklahoma contest.

"I think a positive is that a lot of the schemes we used (against OU) really were working, we just weren't executing them," he said.

"But through watching film, I think everyone sees that a lot of the things that happened on Saturday was us just shooting ourselves in the foot, not making plays when obviously we could have. So from that perspective, we're optimistic."

In fact, senior defensive end Monty Beisel said most of the defensive errors against OU were basic elements of football.

"You look at all the mistakes we made, and they're all fundamental, things you've been doing since you've been playing little league," he said, "and I think if we just come out and make the plays we should make, then we'll be OK."

Regardless of the Sooners, the Cat defense will have a new set of personnel to prepare for in Tech, including the backfield tandem of senior fullback Ricky Williams and sophomore halfback Shaud Williams.

McGraw recognizes Ricky Williams, one of the Red Raiders' all-time leading rushers, not only for his ability to run the football, but for his contributions as a receiver.

"He puts a lot of pressure on your linebackers," McGraw said. "Coming out of the backfield, they like to run the wheel

QUICK FACTS

- Fox Sports Net will carry the Texas Tech/K-State game as part of its national broadcast package.
- K-State has not suffered back-to-back losses since 1994, when it lost to Nebraska and Colorado in the middle of the season.
- Texas Tech head coach Mike Leach is not only in his first season in Lubbock, but in his first collegiate head coaching position. Leach was most recently the offensive coordinator at Oklahoma.
- North Texas is the only common opponent that both the Wildcats and Red Raiders have faced thus far in 2000. K-State decimated the Mean Green 55-10 on Sept. 23, while Tech edged UNT 13-7 in their third game of the season.
- K-State has never lost to Texas Tech since the inception of the Big 12 Conference.
- The Wildcats, who lead the nation in scoring offense (48.4 ppg), will meet a Red Raider defense that ranks 10th in total defense (276.4 ypg) and first by yards in team passing defense (118.4 ypg).

Series history

Series – Texas Tech leads 3-2
Streak – K-State has won two straight
Last meeting – K-State won, 13-2 (11/1/97) in Lubbock, Texas.

Wildcat injury update

- Senior fullback Johnno Lazetich exited the Oklahoma contest and Saturday with an apparent concussion, but head coach Bill Snyder wasn't specific on the injury situation.

"Johnno was injured during the course of the ball game and will be out for probably two weeks," Snyder said.

- Junior left guard Andy Eby, who sat out the Sooner game with an injury to his left arm that appeared to be a dislocated elbow, is questionable for the Texas Tech game this weekend.

"It's possible," Snyder said of Eby's return. "That, again, probably won't be decided until Friday or Saturday."

Right guard provides o-line example

■ Robertson named Cat offensive player of week for performance vs. OU.

By DAN SMITH
Kansas State Collegian

Zero.

That was the number of sacks that right guard John Robertson and the rest of the K-State offensive line gave up against Oklahoma last weekend, earning Robertson Wildcat offensive player of the week honors.

"We take pride in that, we all have a goal each week to not let our quarterback get hit or sacked," Robertson said. "It's something that has developed week after week."

Saturday's performance was just the latest installment in a streak of impressive games for the Wildcats' offensive line, he said.

The tight-knit group of K-State's offense has surrendered one sack through seven games, and has provided the holes for the Wildcats' 219.1 rushing yards per game.

One big reason for the Wildcats' success thus far is Robertson, a 6-foot-4, 291 pound junior, who will be playing in his 17th consecutive game Saturday against Texas Tech, offensive coordinator Ron Hudson said.

"He likes to play and he works hard," Hudson said. "He's got the kind of work ethic that you're looking for."

That work ethic, combined with K-State's dedication to the future, attracted the Olathe East High School graduate to the Wildcats, he said.

"Obviously, I wanted to stay close to home," Robertson said. "When I came up to Manhattan and saw the coaching staff and the atmosphere out here, I could see definitely what the program had done in the years before I got here."

FILE PHOTO BY MICHAEL YOUNG/Collegian

K-State lineman John Robertson looks to block for Aaron Lockett as he rushes for a 55-yard gain on a reverse Sept. 2 at KSU Stadium.

Robertson saw the potential for K-State to be a perennially strong top-10 program, and said that the team's devotion to winning was another reason why he chose the Cats.

"I could definitely see that they were on a mission, and they were going to continue to be successful," he said. "I just felt like it was something that I definitely wanted to be a part of."

Robertson was redshirted his first year at K-State and saw limited action as a backup offensive lineman and special teams player during the Wildcats' 1998 season.

Last season, however, was Robertson's time to shine, as he saw his first start in the team's second game, and came into his own from there, senior center Randall Cummins said.

As a sophomore on a line that punched holes in opposing defenses, Robertson helped K-State score 31 rushing touchdowns, second-most in school history.

Senior center Randall Cummins remembers Robertson's first start, and said that he has changed since that first day.

"Last year was his first start, and he was real nervous and kind of jittery before the game," Cummins recalled, "but now he's more calm, and he handles it better."

This year has meant more of the same for the offensive line, as the Wildcats' have already scored 28 rushing touchdowns, and with five games remaining, the 2000 team has a good chance of eclipsing last year's total, Robertson said.

Cummins describes his fellow lineman as one of the more intelligent players on the team, attributing his wits to experience, which includes a start at right guard in last year's Culligan Holiday Bowl.

"He's a two-year starter now," Cummins said. "He's a tough guy, and he's a smart guy."

On a line that features seniors Cummins, left tackle Milford Stephenson and tight end Shad Meier, Robertson still possesses a leadership skill that he'll need to develop next year as a senior, Cummins said.

"If somebody's not doing what they need to do, he'll get on them, get them up and get them motivated for the next play," the team captain said.

Another senior, quarterback Jonathan Beasley, said the Wildcats are comfortable leaving next year's offensive-line in the hands of players like Robertson.

"I think he's got all the tools right now," Beasley said. "He's a junior, and he knows that after our seniors leave, this is going to be his team and his offensive line, so he's kind of taking the torch in a way.

"He listens to what we say and then tries to use that to make him better, so that guys will listen to him next year."

Although a large part of the line responsibilities will be on Robertson's shoulders next season, he will not have to lead the group alone.

Current offensive line starters Andy Eby and Thomas Barnett will be back for their final year, and rising stars Nick Leckey and Matt Martin will also help the Cats out, Hudson said.

"I think John will be fine," Hudson said. "With Nick Leckey and John in there, and Matt Martin coming back, I think we'll have a nice nucleus coming back."

TECH

routes and get him deep on some balls. Obviously, they use him a lot in the passing game, so it's going to be a big aspect."

Leber said he agreed that shutting down Williams is a focal point for the Cats.

"The whole defense takes great pride in shutting key players down, and we work hard on it all week, and we expect for it to happen on Saturdays," he said. "So when it actually happens, we all take great pride in it, even if you're a key part in it or not."

Meanwhile, on the defense side of the football, Tech is a zone-blitz team very similar to that of Oklahoma, K-State offensive coordinator Ron Hudson said.

That Red Raider unit is directed by sophomore middle linebacker Lawrence Flugence, who leads the nation with 92 total tackles in 2000.

Yet, Tech lacks in their size, Hudson said, giving the Cats an apparent advantage.

"We've got to do some things that will utilize our size, but they know they're not big — they're not going to change," Hudson said. "They tried to move against Nebraska. Well, Nebraska just bowed up and just used the big offense line and got after them. And hopefully we can do the same kind of thing."

The Cornhuskers racked up 530 yards, including 442 on the ground against Tech last weekend, against a Red Raider defense that had only surrendered an average of 232 yards and 10 points per game heading into the NU matchup.

"We know that minus the Nebraska game, they were the No. 2 defense coming in," senior quarterback Jonathan Beasley said. "So we know they're a tough defense, they move around a lot, and we're going to have to come out and execute the best we can."

Optimism retained by team members

By DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

If K-State lost its ambition following the 41-31 loss to Oklahoma last weekend, the players certainly aren't showing it.

"I think, as a whole, the team's optimistic with where we're at," junior free safety Jon McGraw said. "Everyone has a bad day, and unfortunately, it happened for us on Saturday, but I think we're ready to bounce back from it.

"I don't think our confidence has been shaken at all."

That contingency is evident in wide receiver Aaron Lockett, as well.

"We're fine. We were frustrated Saturday night, along with all our fans," he said Tuesday. "It was a team loss, and I think that once we had the opportunity to look at film yesterday, we understood our mistakes, and we know that we still have opportunity to be where we want to be at the end of the year."

That objective, Lockett said, is to win the Dr Pepper Big 12 Championship at Arrowhead Stadium in Kansas City, Mo.

"We can't really worry about anything else. Everything else has to take care of itself," he said. "If we play hard the rest of the season and come out on top, we have an opportunity to play in the Big 12 Championship, and I think that's our goal right now.

"That's probably everybody's goal in the Big 12 — to play in that game — and if you can get there and win it, then you're considered a champion, and that's what it's all about."

Those aspirations were by no means dashed by the OU loss, senior quarterback Jonathan Beasley said, as the Wildcats have overcome similar disappointments in years past.

"We did it last year against Nebraska," he said, "so we know we have the capability of doing that. We just have to, as a team, come out and work hard this week."

Junior linebacker Ben Leber remembers the Nov. 13 Nebraska game last year in Lincoln, in which fifth-ranked K-State lost 41-15 to the No. 6/7 Cornhuskers.

More importantly, however, he recalls the way the team rebounded, posting a 66-0 shutout of Missouri as well as finishing the season with a 24-20 victory in the 1999 Culligan Holiday Bowl.

Leber said the past is proof that the Wildcats can move on and achieve their goals.

"We've been in this situation before, and we've seen how this team can bounce back," he said. "That's one of the most encouraging things."

Yet, Lockett knows the Cats don't have the luxury of overlooking any opponents down the road.

"We've got to buckle down and play ball," he said. "A lot of things we took for granted, as far as always scoring first, and making the big play and making a long run. We just have to make sure we do it now, without taking that for granted, and go out there and play ball like we can."

"It was a team loss, and I think that once we had the opportunity to look at film yesterday, we understood our mistakes, and we know that we still have opportunity to be where we want to be at the end of the year."

Aaron Lockett, wide receiver

Head coach Bill Snyder said the team's attitude is positive despite the lingering disappointment of the Oklahoma loss.

"I think the morale is good — I think it's behind us. Is there still some emotion? I'm sure there is, but I think the focus is where it needs to be," Snyder said.

"I think it's probably the same as anyone else would feel, the natural human responses to a loss, and the tremendous hurt and pain and disappointment initially — and then the embarrassment, and then the anger, that goes along with it — and that's part of the recovery process.

"By and large, I think they've gone through all those emotions, and right now their focus, I believe, is on Texas Tech and our preparation for that, and understanding that they still have some opportunities that exist in front of them that existed prior to this last ball game.

"So, there is some motivation to have an appropriate and a positive attitude about what we're doing and where we're going."

Linebacker returns in style

■ Williams fires up team upon return from years lost to serious knee injury.

By SAM STIERS
Kansas State Collegian

Turelle Williams isn't hard to spot on the field.

K-State's vocal leader on defense usually is jumping around and getting in his teammates' faces, trying to fire them up.

"He's loud," Jason Kazar, senior linebacker, said. "He's very vocal. He wants you to do your job because he's doing the best that he can.

"He's out there every day busting his butt, doing what needs to be done. He gets everyone going and lets you know what's going on. He's definitely a leader on this team."

Williams is in his first year as the Cats' starting middle linebacker. The job was his three years ago, before he suffered a serious knee injury that almost ended his career.

On the fourth play of the second game in 1997, he was chop-blocked by two Ohio University players. Williams' knee collided with a helmet, causing the injury that kept him sidelined for the rest of the season. He was granted a medical red shirt for the year, but said doctors told him he probably would be unable to play football again.

"It was a very hard process trying to get back," Williams said. "I had to tell myself, 'You can do it. You can come back from this stuff. Don't listen to the doctors as far as them telling you that you could never play again.'

"It was a hard situation and it was a hard task for me to overcome, but I did. I felt it was one of the worst things to happen in my life, so it was pretty tough, but I did it."

FILE PHOTO BY STEVEN DEARINGER/Collegian

K-State linebacker Turelle Williams prepares to tackle Colorado tailback Cortlen Johnson on Sept. 30 at Folsom Field in Boulder, Colo.

Kazar said William's resilience during the ordeal never faltered.

"His personality just shows that he's not going to let something like that tear him down," Kazar said. "He showed everybody — the doctors told him that he might not play anymore, but he showed them, and that really shows what kind of a guy he is."

When Williams went down with his injury, Jeff Kelly took over the starting job for the next two seasons, and last year, Ben Leber earned the job at middle linebacker.

But this season, Leber was moved to the strong side, and it was Williams who won the job in the middle. He said while nothing will make up for the time he lost, he is proud he earned the starting job.

"It means everything to me," Williams said. "Everybody's goal is to come into college football and become a starter. For me, to start and be the No. 1 guy is everything. My family is happy, my coaches are happy and my teammates are happy.

"They have a lot of confidence in me, and I refuse to let myself be the weak link. I have a lot of confidence in myself, and it means a lot to me to be the starter."

As a starter, defensive coordinator Phil Bennett said Williams is playing well and is a great influence on the team.

"He carries his emotions on his sleeve," Bennett said. "He plays with great enthusiasm, and he's a guy that loves to play the game, and he plays well.

"I remember last year before the bowl game, he had hurt his leg and was unable to play and I'm telling you, at half time I didn't have to do anything motivational, because he was doing it. His presence helps our players."

Williams said he has no regrets for choosing K-State, after graduating high school in St. Louis, and signing with the Cats in 1995.

"I came here because I felt comfortable here, and I felt it was a trouble free environment. I felt I could play early in my career, and I felt the program was on the rise.

"I really liked Coach Snyder in the times I'd meet with and talked with him. He seemed like a real straightforward kind of guy — someone you could trust. So, those were some of the key factors on me coming to K-State."

However, Williams now has become a key factor of his own for the Cats, acting as the primary recruiter of his brother, sophomore defensive end Melvin Williams.

"He wanted to play with (me)," Turelle Williams said of his brother. "The coaches felt they didn't have to do any recruiting. So, I was probably pretty instrumental in him coming here.

"I hadn't played with him since my senior year in high school, and it was very big for me to get back and play with my brother. He's a guy who helps motivate me when I need it. Just seeing him out there and how far he's come — he really gets me going."

COMEBACK

"Our players will respond. Trust me, we will play hard this weekend, and we'll be prepared," he said. "You'll see the same team, but I think you'll see a team that's hurt but understanding that when you're hurt, you have a tendency to fight back, and I think that's what we'll do."

The team will fight back because its leader is fighting back. Normally, that leader, Beasley, is a quiet guy. He lets his play do the talking, but he used a different kind of speaking style in the locker room after getting shut down by the Sooners, Hudson said.

"He got the whole offense together in the locker room after the game — I didn't, he did — and used some demonstrative language to emphasize what we've got to do this week," Hudson said. "I think Jonathan is a very competitive kid.

"He believes in leading by example, but there's certain situations when he steps up. I think you're going to see Jonathan Beasley do just fine."

The fact still remains, however, that Beasley, the receivers and the entire offense played poorly Saturday. The cause, it would seem reasonable to assume, was that the pressure of playing before the entire country weighed too heavily on the players, but the reason was not nerves, Beasley said.

"I don't think we were nervous. We've played in big games like this before," he said. "It's just a matter of not concentrating."

Actually, it was a lack of concentration on fundamentals, Lockett said.

"We let some things, like our fundamentals, just slip away from us. It was just one those days. I think everybody's susceptible to have one. It's unfortunate that we all had one on the same day."

Whatever the reason for the Cats' play, they will not forget their performance. Rather, it will serve as motivation down the road, Beasley said.

"We know that this is going to be a tough season. No matter who you are, any team can get beat on any day, and we were beaten on that day," he said, "and we know that we don't want to do that again."

"So we have to come out and prepare ourselves to play even better next week."

K-State ready to get back to winning

By DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

I pity Texas Tech.

Of all the teams to set foot into KSU Stadium this season, amid a boisterous crowd of 50,000+ spectators, the Red Raiders are the team that might as well raise the white flag and take it like a man.

Not only are they facing a K-State football team that is ranked No. 10 by the Associated Press and No. 8 in the USA Today coaches poll, not only are they sparring with a squad that claims the top scoring offense in the nation and the fourth-best total defense...

But they're facing a particularly angry one.

And the Wildcats have a right to be, after last Saturday's 41-31 loss to then-No. 8 Oklahoma.

Of course they're upset. The defeat dashed dreams of an undefeated season, sent shivers down every purple-blooded fans' spine, and to say the least, raised many questions about the Cats' legitimacy as one of the elite college football programs in the country.

DEREK BOSS

Not to mention, on top of all that heartache, the loss came to the Oklahoma Sooners and a quartet of former Wildcat coaches: Bob and Mike Stoops, Brent Venables and Mark Mangino.

Now, it was pretty apparent Saturday during the broadcast of ESPN "College Gameday" that these four coaches aren't exactly popular in Manhattan.

Everything OU-related drew a host of boos from the unofficial record crowd of 15,587.

A banner in the stands read, "Will Rogers never met Bob Stoops" on one side, with the word, "LOYALTY" in big letters on the other.

So, to put it bluntly, K-State's loss to the "traitors from Norman" left a bad taste in every Cats' mouth, especially the players.

This Saturday, the Wildcats will get to take out that aggression on a poor, defenseless Texas Tech squad, a team that will seemingly stroll into the Little Apple without the slightest warning of the destruction that's bound to follow.

Maybe I should give first-year head coach Mike Leach a call, but I'm not sure that would do any good. K-State is going to destroy the Red Raiders regardless of their game plan, strategy or motivation heading into this weekend.

It's inevitable.

Their Sports Information department might as well prepare to log some changes in the Tech record books after this one's all over.

But I can't help to feel somewhat apathetic toward them. I mean, the Red Raiders were simply crushed 56-3 by Nebraska last Saturday, the team's worst defeat in school history.

And that's only a 53-point loss, while K-State's offense is averaging nearly that per game this season. Uh-oh, I already can hear the mournful cries down in Lubbock ... but only faintly.

Meanwhile, the spirit of optimism and hopefulness is bellowing loud and clear in Manhattan, as players and fans alike have far from given up on the 2000 season.

In fact, despite the Cats' loss to OU, junior free safety Jon McGraw said the nation has all but turned their backs on K-State.

"I think that people still have a lot of respect for our team — we didn't drop out of the top 10, which we anticipated," he said. "So, if we continue to play well and get better each week, I think we still have a good shot at doing some great things this season."

The good news is great things will occur — I think K-State could easily win out the rest of their regular season schedule (even beat Nebraska). But to do that, the team will need to focus one game at a time.

And it all starts with Texas Tech.

Derek is a sophomore in print and electronic journalism. You can e-mail him at dnb8765@ksu.edu.

Fans should expect Wildcat win against Red Raiders

Hello there, K-Staters. How are things up north?

Things are pretty quiet down here in Lubbock, Texas. Not much going on, really. Well, Nebraska came down and whooped up on Texas Tech football on Saturday, but other than that, nothing much has happened down here.

I know you guys are probably licking some wounds after OU spoiled your national championship plans. But hey, at least your team didn't get beat 56-3 at home in front of a nationally televised audience.

Well, somebody earlier this week asked me if Tech stood a chance against K-State. I thought to myself, "Self, should you laugh in this person's face, or should you actually consider the possibility of the Red Raiders traveling to Manhattan and upsetting the Wildcats?"

JEFF KELLER

Well, I didn't laugh in the person's face, but after thinking about it — I should have. I know you guys are probably used to having other school's columnists writing in saying how your team should beware because their team members have upset in their eyes and they won't settle for anything less than a victory.

Not me — I think K-State will win this game by at least 15 points. If Tech would have played K-State before last week's embarrassing loss, then I might have given them a chance. But not now. Home losses with a 53-point margin tend to take a little steam out of a team.

I know you real die-hard K-State fans know what I am talking about. Life wasn't always so great before Coach Bill Snyder, was it? But Tech has been experiencing too much offensive, defensive and penalty problems lately to expect to pull off an upset. Plus, K-State hasn't been beaten back-to-back in some time, I understand. Tech's offense is the center of much of the controversy here in Lubbock, as its stellar three-point outing against the Cornhuskers might lead you to believe.

The Tech offense has looked brilliant at times this season and bashful at others. The Raiders are pass-happy but often reluctant to test the waters down the field in favor of short screen passes and crossing routes. Tech defense had been the shining light for the Raiders this season until last week. Special teams have been a little suspect all season, especially in Tech's loss to A&M.

I know the Red Raiders have given the Wildcats a good game the past two times they met, but this season I just don't see it happening.

It might, and I would like it to, but man — that Nebraska loss is going to be hard to forget for me, and I am just a sports editor, just think how hard it will be for the football team.

I know that this probably sounds like I am totally down on Tech football, but I am not. I think Tech has a good chance to make it to a bowl game this season, and I know the Red Raiders will beat Texas. But I just don't see them going on the road and beating a bitter-coming-off-a-loss Wildcats squad.

But hey, at least Tech can beat you guys at volleyball all of the time. Have a nice Friday off.

Final score: K-State 35, Tech-13.

Tackles remain area of focus for defensive players, staff

By MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

FILE PHOTO BY MATT STAMEY/Collegian
Milton Proctor and Mario Fatafehi combine to tackle OU's Quentin Griffin for a loss. K-State has been struggling with tackles.

Tackling, or the lack thereof, has been a problem for K-State ever since the Iowa game.

Judging by the team's defensive performance against Oklahoma, that problem has not been solved, head coach Bill Snyder said.

"I believe that we had made some progress, and it was continued progress," he said. "I thought maybe in the Oklahoma game, the wheels fell off in that respect."

The message sent to Snyder by that collapse is that the coaching has been sub par. Teams tend to play as they practice, and the Cats had not practiced well, Snyder said.

"It would say that we're not coaching well enough in order to make our team a better tackling football team," he said. "I think we have not been as demanding as we need to be in that respect. We have got to put players into a position where they become accountable for their practice habits, as it relates to tackling."

Free safety Jon McGraw agreed that the defense's play in practice had not prepared the Wildcats for Saturday's game.

"I don't know if its laziness or what it is, but it's easy just to run by a guy in practice and say I would have made the tackle in a game," McGraw said.

Coaches might have propagated that poor play in practice, but it is up to the players to fix it, Snyder said.

"Obviously we could line up and scrimmage, but we're not going to do that at this juncture in the season. I think what I'm going to have to put my faith in is that our players see it as a what I would consider to be a critical issue," he said, "and would choose to do those things that we believe would allow us to become a better tackling football team."

However, becoming a better tackling team doesn't require less aggressive play Snyder said.

"I'm not concerned with how hard we will hit people. I'm not concerned with the aggressiveness of tackling. That's not the issue here," he said. "Our missed tackles come from the mechanics."

The assertion that poor mechanics was to blame certainly is upheld by the statistics from Saturday. Of the 17 missed tackles against the Sooners, five came on one play, Antwone Savage's 74-yard touchdown catch and run. That many missed tackles is an indication of nothing other than lack of discipline, defensive coordinator Phil Bennett said.

"The biggest thing was, that was a 4-yard pass. Third and 26, we're in zone coverage, we have him 2 yards from the sideline, and we don't make the play. Good defenses don't do that," he said. "We've got to tackle, we've got to use angles, and we've got to wrap up."

Linebacker Ben Leber said he agreed that the lack of fundamentals caused that 74-yard touchdown run to occur, but he said identifying the problem is not that easy on the field.

"It just kind of happens, and you don't really realize it until the person's running past you, and you're thinking, 'how the heck did I miss that tackle,'" Leber said.

Today marks the last day people can register to vote for the November general election.

Jolene Campbell, deputy county clerk, said anyone wanting to register to vote must have their registration forms postmarked by today.

Those who have registered through the driver's license bureau or another outpost should call and verify their registration has been received, she said.

"It would be a really good idea for them to check and see if they are registered," she said.

She said many times, especially at the Department of Motor Vehicles, people are asked if they would like to register while getting their license. If it is a person's first time to register, they have to mail in a card. It's not done electronically, so many people think they are registered but aren't.

Campbell said the number of people registered to vote increased since the last general election, but the number of people voting will not be greater. The percentage of voters in the 1996 general election was 73 percent.

"I think the percentage will be less," Campbell said.

The reason being that in 1996, they were able to purge voters who were inactive.

"Our election rolls were cleaner rolls," Campbell said.

Since December 1995, the county clerk's office is required to keep inactive voters on the election roll until they have missed two general elections. Campbell said the office must send the voter a registration card regardless, and if it is returned — not filled out, or if the person has moved — they are considered inactive.

"Now, we have so many people on the roll, but we can't take them off," she said. "We still have to send them voter registration cards. So, our elections roll is higher than it ever has been."

Campbell said she expected the registration numbers to go up before the Monday deadline, especially when they receive forms from K-State's voter registration drive.

"I would assume we're going to get a fairly good batch within the next couple of days," she said.

Travis Lenkner, Student Governing Association senate chair, said the SGA decided to have the voter registration drive to give students the opportunity to register for the upcoming elections.

"I think the whole project was a good idea," he said. "It battles cynicism and apathy that is sadly so abundant in our age group."

Lenkner said making the booths visible on campus was important because it helped get the word out about the election.

"It just reminds people the elections are coming up, so that makes it worth the time," he said.

Lenkner said there are a lot of reasons people in the 18-24 age bracket don't vote, one being many people don't know where to go or where to begin. That was one reason they had the drive.

"I think the main thing we wanted to do was to let students know it was available," Lenkner said.

Making registration available was the first step, he said, and informing people about their polling place was the second.

"All it takes is a phone call, and someone can point you in the right direction," Lenkner said.

Those who registered and live on campus vote in the K-State Student Union.

Shala Hall, sophomore in life science pre-physical therapy, said she thinks people 18-24 don't vote is because they forget about registering or don't think their vote matters. If they do remember to register, they might not get the absentee ballot filled out.

"I think it doesn't come across too many college students' minds because they don't think to fill out an absentee ballot or go to the courthouse," she said.

Hall said when she was home this summer her mother took her to the courthouse to get an absentee ballot.

"Every vote counts," she said.

Hall said her mother told her it was something she needed to do, and she agreed. Hall said students should vote, because it does count.

"This is who is going to be controlling our government."

Homecoming Week 2000 Winners

The overall winners of Homecoming 2000 were:

Greek Division
Gamma Phi Beta, Delta Upsilon, Theta Xi
Delta Delta Delta, Delta Chi, Lambda Chi Alpha Chi Omega, Kappa Sigma, Sigma Chi
Pi Beta Phi, Alpha Tau Omega, Pi Kappa Phi
Kappa Alpha Theta, Beta Theta Pi, Tau Kappa Epsilon

The results are in, and the sleepless nights are over for those who participated in Homecoming last week.

"There have been lots of nights without sleep and lots of fun. I will definitely be involved again next year," said Jared Armstrong, public relations chair for Marlatt Hall and sophomore in mechanical engineering.

"The Year of the Wildcat" kicked off last Sunday with Wildcat Request Live and finished up on Saturday with the Homecoming ambassador installation at the K-State vs. Texas Tech football game. During halftime, Sarah Geiger, junior in agriculture education, and Brian Karlin, junior in accounting, were announced as the new student ambassadors.

Erica Guries, the 1999-2000 ambassador and a junior in international business, said the job of the ambassadors is to work as a recruitment tool, attend alumni events during the summer, help out with Landon Lectures and attend events organized by the KSU Alumni Association.

With tears in her eyes, Geiger said she is proud to represent K-State. She said she is most looking forward to sharing the K-State spirit with perspective students and working to recruit the best perspective wildcats.

Throughout the week, the residence halls and greek pairings competed for points at each Homecoming event to determine who had the most spirit.

In the greek division, the pairing of Delta Upsilon, Gamma Phi Beta and Theta Xi won first place overall for the week.

Simon Sadiq, president of Delta Upsilon and junior in business administration, said it was awesome that all of their hard work paid off. Sadiq said he thinks their pairing was great and attributed a lot of their success to taking the time before Homecoming to forge a strong bond between the three groups.

Amy Varney, president of Gamma Phi Beta and sophomore in elementary education, said Homecoming was a great success, but she was glad to call it a week.

"It has been a long week, but a great week, and I am glad it is all over," Varney said.

In the residence hall division, the pairing of Marlatt and West halls took first place for the second year in a row.

Jim Stoutenborough, Marlatt Hall president and senior in business, said everyone in the two halls really pulled together and got things done.

"It was a tight race in the residence halls going into the parade, but they made it more fun," Stoutenborough said.

Armstrong said the buzz around their community is this has been one of the best Homecomings ever.

"I have heard lots of seniors saying this has been their best Homecoming because they have had the most fun," he said. "They said there has been more people involved overall."

All of the events throughout the week were planned by an All University Homecoming Committee comprised of volunteers from different realms of campus.

Michelle Stribling, member of the committee and graduate student in personal services, said Homecoming was better than last year because of the diverse involvement of campus groups.

"There was much more participation outside of the greek system and the residence halls," Stribling said.

Referendum to decide center's fate

By BRYAN SCRIBNER
Kansas State Collegian

Students will decide if an additional $6.50 privilege fee should fund the construction of a Student Activities Center.

Student Senate voted Oct. 19 to give students the opportunity to vote on the proposed $4.8-million center. The referendum vote will take place Nov. 9 in the K-State Student Union. Sixty percent approval of those who vote must be acquired for it to pass.

The center would cost students about $1.8 million. If passed, there would be a privilege fee increase for the next 15 years.

Additional funding would come from a privilege fee surplus of about $750,000 and about $2.1 million in excess university revenues.

The KSU Foundation would commit to a $500,000 fund-raising effort if students vote in favor of the center, Student Body President Jake Worcester said. He said this funding could decrease the student fee.

The paper ballot would ask students if they would agree to pay the fee and if they would allow for the privilege-fee surplus to contribute to the project.

Worcester said he would educate every student possible on the logistics of the center.

"This allows students to take it into their own hands," he said.

Student Body Vice President Dana Pracht said more than six representatives of the project would be informing

Cargill gives $1 million gift

By APRIL MIDDLETON
Kansas State Collegian

Cargill Incorporated announced a $1 million gift to help fund K-State's proposed $60 million Grain Science Center Friday.

The $1 million donation, funded by five Cargill business units and matched by the corporation, is Cargill's largest single cash grant outside the state of Minnesota.

The contribution was made in conjunction with Cargill's Higher Education Initiative, which seeks to build mutually beneficial relationships with key universities.

According to Warren Staley, chairman and chief executive officer of Cargill, the company has already provided more than $1 million to K-State in the last 20 years through this initiative to support other facilities and programs.

"This is a terrific opportunity to continue our long-standing and successful partnership with K-State," Staley said. "Cargill Incorporated relies on K-State to train students in our industry. Our best and brightest students should come from Kansas State."

President Jon Wefald said the university and the School of Agriculture have been working for nearly two years planning and quietly raising funds for the proposed complex. Cargill's gift, he said, is a step in the right direction.

"The $1 million lead gift from Cargill is a great way to kick this project off," Wefald said.

Mother faces multiple sentences for murder

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — A woman who claimed her multiple personalities were responsible for the abusive deaths of two of her sons was convicted Saturday on 12 counts, including two of second-degree murder.

Lawyers for Mary Bass, 32, put up an insanity defense and insisted Bass had severe psychosis that included a personality named "Sharon" who controlled her actions.

Triplet brothers Gary and Larry Bass, both 8, died in October 1999 after being starved and infected with burns.

Officials said the mother routinely locked the boys in a room and fed them little, and allegedly dipped the boys' feet in scalding water as punishment.

Jurors recommended eight life sentences, plus 32 years in prison, for Bass. She was charged with two counts of murder, four counts of armed criminal action and seven counts of child abuse.

Defense lawyers have not disputed Bass burned the boys' lower legs and feet on Oct. 15, 1999. The Kansas City woman also told police she locked the boys in a room before that and starved them for weeks to discipline them. Larry was found dead five days later, and Gary died two days after that.

Psychologist Marilyn Anne Hutchinson, of Kansas City, testified Bass suffered from multiple personalities, post-traumatic stress syndrome and forms of schizophrenia.

The case also was an indictment of the way Missouri's Division of Family Services handles abuse cases.

Records recently made public showed social workers thought Mary Bass' children had been abused repeatedly, but didn't recommend removing them before the two boys died.

Kansas woman wears Miss Nude crown

BURLINGTON, Kan. — Jeannie Bates is a beauty queen who knows some people in her hometown might have trouble accepting the way she won her trophy.

The 43-year-old Bates won the trophy wearing nothing but a cowboy hat — which she says is probably older than most of the women she beat in the Miss Nude North America competition Aug. 20.

"I was worried about what my town would think," she said. "I take into consideration that I'm sitting right smack dab in the middle of the Bible Belt."

While most of the 250 competitors are professional exotic dancers, Bates is a graphics designer who owns a sign-making business, and enjoys raising horses.

Bates used the stage name "Blondie Cowgirl," and was named winner of the pageant after judging based on criteria such as poise, makeup and hair.

National program battles oil use, pollution

Manhattan is Ernie Oakes' star city.

Oakes, Clean Cities program manager with the U.S. Department of Energy, represents 12 states and was on hand Friday at the Manhattan Area Clean Cities Coalition Alternative Fuel Ride and Drive Expo at Transportation Design and Manufacturing in Manhattan.

Manhattan became a Clean City Oct. 4, 1999. Manhattan is one of 80 Clean Cities in the country and one of two to do so voluntarily.

"The city came forward," Oakes said. "This is my star city, and I actually show it and talk about it a lot because Manhattan really didn't have to do the things they are doing with alternative fuel.

"It's good for the community, and it's good for the future, and that's the kind of stuff I wish I could get some of my bigger cities to do that are mandated to do that kind of stuff to get on board."

A control panel lets drivers of the 2001 Toyota Prius know what sort of power the car uses as it drives. The Prius is a gasoline and electric hybrid sedan.

Oakes said the objective of the Clean Cities program is to reduce the country's dependence on oil from abroad.

Jeff Frasier, alternative fuel vehicle national account manager for Ford Motor Company, said energy issues are at the forefront of national politics. He said he remembered the oil embargo in the early 70s and hasn't forgotten the Persian Gulf War and the recent increases in oil prices.

"Our continued dependence on these sources for our transportation energy needs is putting our country in a bind, and we really need to diversify and look for more sustainable fuel for our future," Frasier said.

Frasier said 95 percent of our country's transportation fuel is derived from foreign oil. He said he would like to see a much higher percentage of the fuel that the United States burns manufactured at home.

"We can use homegrown products," Frasier said. "Kansas is sitting on a gold mine of natural gas."

Dianne Stoddard, assistant city manager and Manhattan Area Clean Cities coordinator, said if it were not for the proactive political leadership of Manhattan Mayor Karen McCulloh and Manhattan City Commissioner Bruce Snead, Manhattan would not have its Clean City status.

"We're so unique," Stoddard said. "We're not like the New York cities and we're not like the Dallas' of the world and the other cities that are having to do this because they have such air quality problems."

Stoddard said she would like to host the expo again next year.

"I think as the word spreads more about gas prices, it really drives people interest because it drives people pocketbooks," she said. "As the prices grow, it creates more of an interest in alternative fuels."

The Ride and Drive Expo was aimed at fleet buyers and businesses that utilize vehicles in their businesses. There were about 40 people in attendance, including four Manhattan High School auto tech students.

"I'm glad to see them here on their day off of school," said Steve Barnes, auto tech instructor at Manhattan High.

K-State's Solar Car Team had its car on display as was one of six compressed natural gas-powered dragsters in the world.

Ford and Chrysler vehicles were represented, but Toyota's 2001 Prius gasoline and electric hybrid sedan, which just hit domestic showrooms this summer, was the Expo's star. The Prius gets 52 mpg in the city and 48 miles per gallon on the highway.

Derek Lee, assistant finance manager and sales consultant at Little Apple Toyota Honda, said they have sold two Prius' and have three more on order. He said one Prius was sold to a father who has two daughters at K-State.

"He was tired of their unreliable cars and paying the repair bills and bought them a Prius," Lee said. "The day he picked it up, we drove all over campus and we were stopped as much as were going and we got 52 miles per gallon."

Derek Lee, rear, Little Apple Toyota Honda employee, explains the energy monitor in the Toyota Hybrid Prius to Karl Birns, of the environmental studies program at the University of Kansas, before he takes it for a test drive Friday. Birns said he noticed the difference between the Prius and completely gas-powered vehicles while driving it, but he said it had enough power for his liking.

Voting location should extend beyond Union

On Tuesday evening the Senate Operations committee has an important decision to make in regards to voting on Nov. 9 for the Student Activity Center.

That decision, among others, is if students will only be able to vote in the K-State Student Union.

The answer should be no. The Union is not the center of campus. To only provide students with the opportunity to vote at that location would perhaps help the center to pass, but it would not necessarily offer a place that is equally accessible to everyone.

The voting day should have been two days prior, on the same date as the national elections, if possible. This is because if students already have a mind set to vote, they would be more likely to remember it.

Student Senate economically did the correct thing in terms of not allowing students to vote online. Student Body President Jake Worcester said in order to do that, Senate would have to have a contract with someone to provide those services.

Yet by eliminating the online voting, it could decrease voter turnout.

Worcester said students who do care will make the effort to vote. This is true. However, there needs to be more opportunities for students to vote than just one. This also needs to be the case at other referendums.

Students need other places besides the Union to vote for something that will affect their pocketbooks.

Face-to-Face

Warm atmosphere gives K-State hometown qualities

AMY CUNNINGHAM

I am the person that you hate. The one who, when you pass on the sidewalk, refuses to look down, or directly at the plain wall on the left or anywhere except your face. I am the one who, at the very least, smiles at you until you smile back. Or until you look away yourself.

Maybe you don't realize that it is you who I am smiling at. Maybe you just don't feel like smiling yourself, or you are too busy to take the time to move the muscles in your face. Maybe you don't know that in small communities like these people are more than just people who coexist. We are neighbors. We are Wildcats.

When I chose to come to K-State all those years ago, it was because of the people. It was because, on that brisk fall day when I took the campus tour, with the rain pouring down and soaking through my high school letter jacket and all of the gloom that seemed to envelop the campus, K-Staters went out of their way to be friendly.

On that crummy day, when my friends and I needed directions to Anderson Hall, all we had to do was look lost. We never needed to ask for assistance because someone recognized that we were lost and walked with us until we reached our destination and met up with our tour.

When the tour started, as we walked along I noticed that everyone seemed to be best friends with the Ambassador. They would shout out her name and wave from across the lawn. I thought that K-State was like "Cheers" where everybody knows your name, and that was what I found most attractive about this school. That friendly atmosphere. That K-State atmosphere.

I wasn't the only one who noticed it. All the way home, my friends and I talked about how K-State reminded us of our hometown. How it was so warm and friendly. How it was so unlike KU.

Maybe it was on the year-long hiatus between my tour and the time that I enrolled when the campus unanimously voted to become shut-off. It could have been when K-State became trendy. Who knows? What I have noticed in my nearly five years here is the decline in our sense of community on this campus.

I don't care who you are or why you are here. I don't care what color you are or what country you are from. I don't care if you are from Johnson County or in a greek house or independent. As our paths cross from now on, pass along a smile and know that you have just made a Wildcat's day.

Financial gain from football loss should be condemned

Editor,

I would like to address the K-State students who were selling the "score cards" after the OU game at the southeast corner gate to the stadium. I realize that you are trying to make a little extra money; I think that the company you were working for should be kept out of our stadium in the future. Making money off of our team's loss should not be allowed in our own stadium.

What really concerns me is the conduct of the students who were getting in the faces and taunting the fans and alumni of your own school. What was the purpose? One young woman jumped in front of me, saying that I should buy one and frame it.

She said this in a taunting manner. It was not a joke. Another did the same to my husband. This was done to a large number of our fans coming out of the stadium after suffering through a heart-breaking game while a few OU fans watched and laughed. I still, several days later, find it amazing that I was treated in this manner by a student from my own alma mater.

You should know that I called It's Greek to Me to complain because I thought you were working for them and the Cats' Closet. I am still unsure who were you working for.

In the future, please remember that a lot of alumni attend sports events and a lot of them contribute money to scholarships. You might be a recipient. This kind of tacky behavior might stop that scholarship. Please respect other fans and alumni of your school.

Controversy part of all journalism

REED DUNN

Controversial issues tend to make their way into the Collegian on a regular basis. It just happens that reporting the news often entails reporting controversy.

Not everyone will be happy with what is printed each day. I understand that. My goal as editor is to make sure everyone understands what the Collegian is about, which is accurate, fair reporting of the news. A reporter must talk with people on all sides of the story for this to be successful.

The Collegian tries to maintain a professional appearance, and competes to be K-State's No. 1 source for campus news. Even though we are a student newspaper, we operate in the same manner as other professional publications.

The one aspect of journalism where balanced coverage may not be found is on the opinion page. Clearly labeled, the page reflects the opinions of individuals, who are often members of the Collegian staff, but have freedom of individual expression.

I would like to think columnists take time to research their topics, learning facts to back up their opinions. Unfortunately, this does not always happen.

Since these are individual views, they are not necessarily edited for content. They are edited only for style, libel and slander. Editing for more than this would take away from the columnists' rights to express their opinions.

There are times when columnists step over the line. There are times when they offend people. I understand this happens, and I am here to talk through the questions and concerns. Call or e-mail me. Write a letter to the editor. I will take the time to meet with you — about anything.

Republicans, democrats face off at regional forum

By MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

Two seemingly opposite forces, Republican incumbents and Democrat challengers in four different races, faced off in a debate Thursday night sponsored by the Manhattan/Riley County League of Women Voters. In a unconventional manner, however, there were more agreements than disagreements.

During the entire two-hour forum, the Democrat challengers showed an unwillingness to debate any point with the incumbents, all Republicans.

In the race for District One County Commissioner, for instance, Ruth Schrum-D and Bob Newsome-R both favored increasing city involvement in luring businesses back to Riley County from Pottawatomie County and its lower sales tax.

The candidates' methods to accomplish this revitalization of the Riley County economy did differ, however.

Newsome said he favored promoting construction along Kansas Highways 18 West, 18 East and 177. Schrum advocated forming a small business park and using individual persuasion.

"Go over to Pottawatomie County and tell those businesses how much we need them," she said.

In the race for District 66 State Representative, Dean Stramel-D and Jeff Peterson-R both favored improving state child care, especially the foster home system. The candidates did differ on their stances on repealing the food sales tax.

Stramel said he would like to make up for the lost revenue by increasing the sales tax on luxury items such as cars.

"It's a regressive tax," Stramel said. "It's a very poor way to treat the needs of those less well off."

Peterson, on the other hand, has already voted once against the flat removal of the tax.

"K-State and our schools would suffer," Peterson said. "I'm not willing to cut services."

The two candidates also agreed that education was a high priority in Kansas, but disagreed on how to improve the current system. Stramel, for instance, said he would increase teacher salaries to reward them for their hard work.

"There is nothing better for students than a good teacher who is happy about his job," Stramel said.

Peterson said he would rather use those funds to limit the increase in college tuition.

In the race for Kansas Senate, David Norlin-D and Mark Taddiken-R, were one of the few sets of opponents to openly disagree with each other. On the issue of child care, Norlin said the primary concern of the state should be strengthening families and, thus, decreasing the need for a foster system.

Taddiken, on the other hand, focused on the slow, tedious adoption system in Kansas. Prospective parents are bypassing Lutheran Social Services, the agency that handles adoptions for Kansas, in favor of private adoption agencies with quicker acceptance times.

On the issue of mental health, Taddiken said that he would like to see whether insurance companies would not help fund home and hospital mental care.

Norlin joked around the issue.

"If it wasn't such an important issue, I would say you could go crazy trying to solve the problem," Norlin said.

He did say he would like to increase funding to low-income families to help them endure the stress of their situations.

"You can only take so much of that before you start to go a little crazy," Norlin said.

The final debate of the evening was between candidates running for the State Board of Education. Eloise Lynch-D and Bruce Wyatt-R were both in favor of board-imposed standards but disagreed on the use of testing to evaluate teachers.

Lynch said she was opposed to the use of standardized testing in teacher evaluations. Wyatt somewhat disagreed.

"Testing establishes a trend line. Are we going up or down?" Wyatt said. "But it's not the end game. It's unfair to judge teachers solely by students results."

Wichita Mayor addresses race relations as part of civil rights lecturė series

By COLLEEN FOOTE
Kansas State Collegian

Mayor Bob Knight of Wichita is changing the aspects of his office and his life by focusing on racism.

Knight, winner of numerous awards for initiatives concerning community development and race relations, presented "Undoing Racism" Thursday night in the Houston Street Ballroom for the Dorothy L. Thompson Civil Rights Lecture series.

"We have run away from race for far too long," Knight said. "We will never achieve racial healing if we're not willing to confront each other, to take risks, to speak from the heart, to speak from the soul, say all the things we're not supposed to say — in short, put on the table all of our fears, our wishes, and our dreams."

As president of the National League of Cities, Knight has launched a national initiative focusing on racism.

"I picked racism because those of us who say we care and are white must stop leaving the task of addressing racism to our friends of color," Knight said. "Every race must act and try to heal the scars that racism has left on our society."

In Wichita, Knight has begun "Study Circles" that combine eight to 10 people of different races who meet several times in a period to discuss things going on in the community. The "Study Circles" avoid the topics of race and instead focus on looking and understanding each other.

Knight said he believes racism can only be undone when people of all races begin to talk and listen to one another.

"We must look for effective ways to move to common ground with each other and recognize that we are truly interdependent," he said. "The only way we're going to find common ground is to search to find a higher ground."

Politics and morality are deeply related, and we need politics that offer a vision of transformation and reconciliation, Knight said. Transforming individual participation and social policy, he believes, is the key to change.

"This is a major, unresolved social issue in our country," Knight said. "We'll never adjust to an America or a community where there is racism, which takes away fundamental human freedoms."

Karen McCulloh, mayor of Manhattan, said she thought Knight covered an issue that affects every community.

"This is a terribly important issue," McCulloh said. "Local governments, even Manhattan, must discuss this issue and admit to this issue."

Knight mentioned how Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. confessed to being a "maladjusted person," meaning he simply had not been able to adjust to a world of discrimination. Knight asked the audience to join him in being maladjusted.

"We must commit to being maladjusted until we see true renewal and transformation of the American spirit," Knight said. "This transformation must occur, from my perspective, if we are to survive as a nation."

Manhattan resident Kareece Larry said she liked Knight's speech, but she expected to find more answers on how to cure racism.

"I wish he gave more instructions about how to bring about change," Larry said. " But I realize this is a hard subject and he made the point that we have no definite answer of a cure."

Unlike a runner who knows where the finish line is, Knight said he does not know where the finish line is with racism. He hopes he has brought about a new awareness of an important topic in our society.

"This isn't an emotional phase in my life," he said. "This is an issue I'm committed to for the rest of my life."

Stepping Forward

Outcome different against similar Texas Tech, OU teams

By DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

Two straight weeks. Two similar football teams.

That was the scenario for K-State's matchup Saturday with Texas Tech, and although schematic likenesses proved evident in both the Oklahoma and Red Raider squads, the difference would lie in the outcome.

K-State (7-1, 3-1) bounced back from its 41-31 loss to the Sooners, earning a 28-23 victory over Texas Tech (5-3, 1-3) in front of 51,140 at KSU Stadium.

It was a win the Cats needed, linebacker Ben Leber said.

"We came out facing the same type of offense and the same type of defense and got a win," he said. "That's great for our confidence and great for everything. It was a big challenge put on us, not only internally, but externally by the media and everybody else, so we just wanted to come out with the 'W.'"

However, the win didn't come easily for the Wildcats, leading one to believe that the team might still be experiencing a "hangover effect" from the Oklahoma loss.

"Maybe to a certain degree, I think that's probably true," head coach Bill Snyder said. "I can't speak for every person in our program. For some, maybe that might be the case, for others maybe not."

Regardless, Snyder said the team confidence probably took a few steps back after the OU defeat, which may have affected the Cats' performance against the Red Raiders.

"I would say after last week's ball game that might well be an honest assessment, and may have contributed to some of the inconsistencies of this week — that's a possibility," he said. "But I think we're moving in the right direction in that regard. If you've been around here very long, you've got a lot to be confident about.

"Today, we played well enough to win, but we didn't play like we're capable of," Snyder said Saturday. "Now, if you're an individual that is weak-minded enough to allow that to affect your confidence, then we have a problem. But I wouldn't think there's any reason for them not to be confident in what they're capable of doing."

And confidence can be taken from this weekend's victory, senior strong safety Jarrod Cooper said.

"Texas Tech is a good football team, pound for pound. Any team that overlooks Texas Tech has something coming to them," he said.

K-State's win was important, even though the Cats failed to match the 56-3 shellacking Nebraska handed the Red Raiders last week in Lubbock, Snyder said.

"We're not a 'Nebraska' on offense, and that ball game got out of hand very quickly. An interception and they run it in the end zone, then two quick scores after that, and it kind of snowballed," he said. "I think, by and large, this is a good Texas Tech defense."

And Tech proved that Saturday as it held K-State, the No. 1 scoring offense in the nation, to 28 points and only 285 yards of total offense.

But in the end, it was a special teams play that ignited the Wildcats.

With K-State leading 14-9 midway through the third quarter, Tech faced a fourth-and-25 from its own 26-yard line.

Senior Brice Libel broke through the Red Raider punt team unit to block the kick, the fourth of his career, and give the Cats possession deep in Tech territory.

K-State needed two plays to capitalize, scoring on a 15-yard touchdown run by Roc Cartwright to extend its lead to 21-9.

Libel said the Cats' punt block unit is raising concerns for opposing teams.

"It creates a balance on that unit where they can't just be concerned with punting away from David Allen or Aaron Lockett," he said. "They have to be worried about getting the ball off."

Following Cartwright's TD, Tech countered with a touchdown of its own on its next possession to cut the Cat margin to 21-16 after three quarters of play.

K-State missed two scoring opportunities in the start of the fourth, as Jonathan Beasley threw interceptions on back-to-back possessions, both in Red Raider territory.

However, Wildcat cornerback Dyshod Carter gave K-State a pick of its own on the next Tech possession, leading to Josh Scobey's 2-yard touchdown run and a 28-16 Cat lead with 3:52 to play.

That TD was important, considering the Red Raiders and QB Kliff Kingsbury drove 79 yards to score with 0:31 remaining to slice the lead to 28-23.

MATT STAMEY/Collegian

Brice Libel blocks the punt of Texas Tech's Clinton Greathouse in the third quarter. K-State recovered the punt on its own 19 and scored two plays later.

Defensive statistics cause concern for Wildcat team

By MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

K-State's defensive performance in the last two games might indicate that the Cats are lacking in that area.

Two weeks ago, Oklahoma quarterback Josh Heupel threw for 374 yards against a K-State defense that had been giving up only one-third of that number. On Saturday, Kliff Kingsbury and the Texas Tech aerial attack posted 302 passing yards on the Cats.

Those stats are indeed cause for concern, head coach Bill Snyder said.

"Regardless of who you play against, if you're giving up 300 yards a ballgame passing, then you have to have some concerns about it," he said.

But then again, K-State doesn't exactly have a lot of experience defending teams so heavily dependent on the pass.

"I don't think I've ever played a game where a guy's thrown 60 passes," Snyder said, after Kingsbury completed 29 of 60 on the day, breaking the record of 58 attempts against K-State set by Montana in 1992.

The reality of the situation is that if a team passes as often as Texas Tech, odds are that it will hit at least a few big plays, strong safety Jarrod Cooper said.

"They pass 90 percent of the time, and no matter what you do, no matter what team you are anywhere, if you get passed on that many times, someone's going to catch the ball," he said.

To K-State's credit, the statistical results of the last two games might have been the same, but the outcomes were not. The Cats held the Red Raiders to 18 fewer points than Oklahoma, primarily because players didn't miss tackles and lined up correctly.

The Sooners might have scored more points, but Texas Tech was actually the better offensive team, Cooper said.

"I just think things went wrong," he said about the Oklahoma game. "If we had been where we were supposed to be, it would have been a whole different story, I think. It was a very good offense, but we could have played better than we did.

"If you went from OU to Texas Tech's receivers, Texas Tech's would be better than OU's. They were good. They were burning all over the place. We just played our assignments this week."

The Cats might have been more assignment sound, but Texas Tech receivers were often found wide open. In the second quarter, for instance, the Red Raiders escaped a third-and-13 from their own 33 yard line by hitting wide-open tight end Cole Roberts in the middle of the field.

K-State missed the coverage, but Texas Tech also caused defensive confusion, defensive coordinator Phil Bennett said.

"They went no huddle the whole game, and we ended up getting a mix on a call. Shoddy (Dyshod Carter) thought he had help, and he didn't," he said, "and they shifted their personnel on first down. In the second half, we just kept dime in the whole time. They'd run a person in, which is perfectly legal, and it got us out of whack."

Texas Tech's ability to build long possessions was also enhanced by three defensive pass interference penalties and an unsportsmanlike conduct foul on the Cats. Those penalties were the partial result of Texas Tech's tendency to throw the ball down the field, Snyder said.

"They figure you just cast it up there, and one of those guys will throw those yellow things around, and you get a first down," he said.

Bennett agreed penalties, along with great Red Raiders plays, hurt the Cats.

"They threw a couple of deep balls that were great catches and great throws," he said. "Had some interference calls that I'm not going to comment on. You've got to be making an attempt to be catching the ball."

Bennett did comment, however, on the unsportsmanlike conduct penalty called on defensive end Chris Johnson.

"The celebration penalty is supposed to be for people who taunt," Bennett said. "That was Chris' way. I'm not condoning it, but at that point of the game — wow."

Penalties aside, the Cats still have to improve their pass defense, Bennett said.

"We're a work in progress right now," he said. "We've got to get better."

Record run

Scoring on a one-yard quarterback sneak in the second quarter against Texas Tech, senior Jonathan Beasley registered his 15th rushing touchdown of the season, setting a new K-State single-season record. The TD surpassed Bill Butler (1971) and Michael Bishop (1998) who each had 14. Beasley has also scored at least one rushing touchdown in seven of the Wildcats' eight games this year, missing only at Colorado.

Winning the close one

With K-State's 5-point victory over the Red Raiders, the Cats have won the past 12 regular season games decided by seven points or less.

Return to the old

In his first punt return since being injured in the season opener against Iowa, senior David Allen took a third-quarter kick and returned it 21 yards. He followed with a 44-yard return in the fourth quarter to total 65 yards on two returns.

Goose egg

K-State went scoreless in the first quarter for the first time since Nov. 13, 1999, when Nebraska led the Cats 16-0 after the opening frame in Lincoln. The last time the Wildcats were held scoreless in the first period at home also was versus the Huskers in 1996. Texas Tech hasn't allowed a point in the first quarter in six of eight games this season.

Safety measures

Kevin Curtis' second-quarter sack of Beasley in the end zone was the first safety K-State has given up since Nebraska last season, when the Cornhuskers blocked a punt. The Red Raiders also registered a safety against the Wildcats in the two teams' last meeting on Nov. 1, 1997. Saturday's sack was the first K-State's offensive line has allowed on Beasley and just the second this season.

Sack stats

With four sacks against Tech, K-State's defense has recorded 32 for the season, already surpassing last year's total 31.

Ground control

In their last two outings, the Cat defense has allowed just 46 yards rushing on 64 attempts for an average of 0.7 yards per carry. Oklahoma only mustered 11 yards on 36 attempts, while Tech charted 28 rushes for 35 yards.

TD frenzy

Senior wide-out Quincy Morgan's 21-yard touchdown catch (the 19th of his career) in the second quarter made him only the second player in school history to register 10 TD receptions in a season. Kevin Lockett (1993-96) had 13 in 1995.

First pick

Junior linebacker Ben Leber intercepted the first pass of his K-State career in the second quarter. The ball was intended for Tech wide-out Tim Baker, but was deflected into Leber's hands by the Cats' DeMarcus Faggins at K-State's eight-yard line.

Injury report

Junior left guard Andy Eby (left arm) and senior fullback Johnno Lazetich (probable concussion) were both sidelined, as expected for the Tech contest. In addition, senior tight end Shad Meier didn't suit up due to an unspecified injury.

"Shad was injured in practice and was unable to play," head coach Bill Snyder said. "I don't know how quickly we're going to get him back. We're keeping our fingers crossed."

Masking a deception

Shocking, controversial film will make movie-goers think

Review by CORBIN H. CRABLE
Kansas State Collegian

COURTESY PHOTO

I just love good controversy.

In Spike Lee's "Bamboozled," you get it in abundance.

Spike Lee ("Malcolm X," "Summer of Sam") weaves a tale of a black television executive, Pierre Delacroix (Damon Wayans), who brings to life a modern day minstrel show.

He finds two down-on-their luck performers, Manray (Savion Glover) and Womack (Tommy Davidson), who become the star attractions for the all-black variety show. These actors are given black face makeup, as opposed to white actors who donned the makeup in the minstrel shows of the 1920s.

The show causes an uproar in the community, as it deals with the stereotypes with which blacks had to live, both in pre- and post-slavery America.

However, amid the controversial theme of the program, audience ratings go through the roof. As the show gains viewership, the lives of Delacroix, his actors and his assistant, Sloan Hopkins (Jada Pinkett Smith), drastically change for the better.

Finally, at the peak of the show's popularity, audiences (both on-screen and off) are dealt a very surprising and sobering ending.

As expected, "Bamboozled" has been met with mixed criticism.

Manray and Womack gain national acclaim through their show characters, Mantan and Sleep 'N Eat. Basically, they make a living by degrading their race and drudging up images of a time in America's past when blacks were treated as almost sub-human.

Lee's message, I believe, is that this difficult time in the past of black people must not be forgotten, but to thrive on it isn't healthy either, and that it is more important to strive toward destroying the stereotypes than to dwell on them.

The minstrel show in "Bamboozled," then serves two purposes. It allows us to recognize the hardships endured by blacks, and it also allows blacks to reclaim what was a negative look at their culture and poke fun at it, almost as part of a healing process.

Also, an encouraging aspect of the movie is that Delacroix himself is a black television executive, a comforting sign that media is becoming more diverse, if gradually. This makes a powerful statement of race and its role in social status.

Whatever you think of this movie, at least you'll think. The irony of such a film is that while the minstrel show can be seen as degrading, the overall message of learning from the past and looking ahead to the future is a strong one.

"Bamboozled" is a masterpiece in its own time, and as shocking and controversial as it might seem, you'll never see a more poignant or meaningful film.

Story about trading a soul for dreams provides humor

Review by CORBIN H. CRABLE
Kansas State Collegian

Oh sure, striking a deal with the Princess of Darkness seemed like a good idea at the time.

In "Bedazzled," shy, dorky Elliot (Brendan Fraser) has his eye on co-worker Allison (Frances O'Connor) and would give anything to be with her.

Anything.

Enter the Devil (Elizabeth Hurley), who will give our nerdy hero what he wants ... and more. In exchange for Elliot's hopes and dreams to come true, all she needs is his soul.

More specifically, Elliot gets seven wishes. And he uses them to the fullest extent. Of course, the Devil must have a bit of fun on the way at his expense.

One by one, the wishes blow up in his face. Throughout the course of the movie, Elliot goes from being a Colombian drug lord to President of the United States to a seven-foot-tall professional basketball player (who has only one shortcoming to speak of).

This is one of the only movie remakes I've seen that manages to live up to the original version.

The original "Bedazzled," which debuted in 1967, originally played upon the idea of selling one's soul to the Devil, and the remake (directed by Harold Ramis of "Ghostbusters" fame) is just as charming and witty as the original, with Fraser's Jerry Lewis-like character and Hurley's seductive, sinfully delicious Satan lighting up the screen.

Both actors do an amazing job of playing off each other, and even though some of the situations in the movie are predictable (even if you haven't seen the original), they at least will bring a chuckle from your mouth.

"Bedazzled" is just one of those rare, charming movies that, even though it's a cheesy, no-brainer, will entertain you for entertainment's sake. Just sit back and let your brain turn to mush for a change.

Still, if you'd rather get a deeper look at the same story, go read "Faust."

But don't expect to laugh as hard.

Book provides information for those lacking knowledge of sports

Review by KRISTEN DYMACEK
Kansas State Collegian

It's time to come out of the closet and admit that you know nothing about sports.

But don't worry, there's help available. It's not a 12-step program. Instead, it's an easy-to-follow guide explaining the fundamentals of four popular American sports.

"Men Are From Locker Rooms, Women Are From Luxury Boxes — A Woman's Survival Guide To Understanding Spectator Sports" by Laurie Selwitz explains the basics of basketball, baseball, hockey and football.

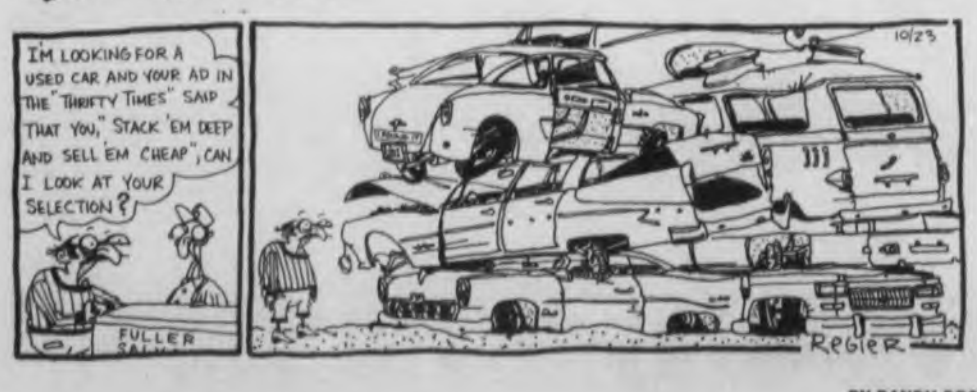
Selwitz, who is currently with FOX Sports Net in Los Angeles, has written this guide, which definitely is geared for the people who know nothing, and I do mean nothing, about sports. It explains the bare basics of equipment, positions and the rules and regulations used in the different sports including the differences between a baseball, a basketball, a football and a hockey puck.

I was serious when I said it was basic.

Because it is so simplistic, this is not a book for sports fans who know the ins and outs of the game. But for the completely clueless people who somehow missed out on high school sports, this is a God-send.

Confused on the difference between a two-point conversion and a safety or the difference between a screen and a pick and roll? Then you are one of the clueless who will benefit from this book.

This is an excellent beginners' guide to sports with only one glaring error.



The error I found with this book is that Selwitz refers to it as the women's survival guide. Um, excuse me — while the women-are-stupid-when-it-comes-to-sports stereotype might have been relevant a few decades ago, it's not that way now.

In fact, I know just as many men as I do women who are unfamiliar with the rules of sports.

So, men, feel free to pick up this book and learn a few fundamentals. Just because it says it's a women's survival guide doesn't mean men can't learn from it, too. Besides, reading the guide won't be nearly as embarrassing as having your girlfriends explain the rules of the game to you.

Ag students attend workshop

By AMBER CUNNINGHAM
Kansas State Collegian

Juniors and seniors from the College of Agriculture learned about leadership at the next level Thursday and Friday at the K-State Student Union during a workshop titled "Changing Seasons, College Career."

"The workshop provided juniors and seniors a chance to think about the transition from college to a career," Sarah Geiger, junior in agricultural education, said.

Geiger said the conference was split into four sessions — winter, spring, summer and fall — symbolizing the different seasons in a college student's career. Stacy Campbell, a K-State alumnus, was the speaker for winter. Geiger said his message was about dormancy.

A career panel presented the spring session. Their message was about emerging and thinking about values.

"When we leave college, our goal should be to live, learn and leave a legacy," Geiger said.

The theme for summer was growing and developing.

Geiger said students broke off into small groups to rank a list of 40 values such as family, friends and knowledge. She said each small group was led by young people in the industry.

The fall session was about harvest and reaping what students have learned. Geiger said again the message was to leave a legacy on the world.

In the fall session, students went through a rotational workshop, meeting with industry professionals from companies like Cargill Incorporated. Students learned about leadership in the community, within families and personal life, as well as leadership in the agriculture industry.

Jill Caston, Ag Council President and junior in agricultural economics, said she enjoyed Campbell's speech.

"He said to look at the world through simple eyes, and remember when having a bad day that a lot of situations are worse than ours and to keep that in perspective," Caston said. "Hearing the experiences of industry professionals gives me an idea of what it's going to be like in the industry."

Andy Armbruster, senior in agricultural economics, said he liked hearing about real world perspectives on how to take college experiences and apply them later in life.

"Industry experience will be more in depth and have a lot more responsibility," Armbruster said. "We won't always use what we learned in the classroom, but instead what we learned from organizations and clubs we were involved in."

Armbruster said he liked the concept of the workshop.

"This is the first time the College of Agriculture has brought in leaders and incorporated leadership to cover goals and industry," he said. "This may start trends for other colleges in the university."

CARGILL

Brendan Donnelly, head of K-State grain science and industry department, said the proposed complex will consist of five new buildings: a feed mill, a flour mill, a bioprocessing and industrial value-added center, an international grains program conference center and a teaching, research, baking and administrative building.

Donnelly said the university has adopted the Grain Science Complex in its 10-year capital improvement plan as priority after the current Veterinary Science building project.

Financial support for the complex is estimated to be half from private sources and the remaining half from public sources.

"Today we have over $5 million committed to the complex," Donnelly said. "This is a very ambitious program. It's possible that we could be breaking ground on one, two or even three of the buildings within the next six to nine months."

Marc Johnson, dean of agriculture, said new facilities are important if K-State's College of Agriculture is to remain top-notch.

The department of grain science and industry is the only one of its kind in the nation to offer baccalaureate degrees in baking science and management, feed science and management and milling science and management. The department also offers master's and doctoral degrees in grain science.

"Excellent and relevant units require excellent people, students and facilities. We have the people, but there are concerns that our facilities are outdated," Johnson said.

Great facilities, Johnson said, make it easier to hire and retain faculty and staff, attract students interested in agriculture and increase the opportunity of receiving individual and government grants.

"Most of all great facilities make it easier to showcase the sophistication of the industry," Johnson said.

Wefald said the $1 million contribution from Cargill to fund the proposed complex is an investment that will reaffirm that K-State's College of Agriculture is state of the art.

"This is a unique opportunity worldwide to have this many grain facilities in one place," Wefald said. "The new complex will be the premier place in the whole world."

students. She said they would visit student organizations every night until the referendum vote.

"We understand the concerns of information for students," she said. "We are doing our best to inform and educate students."

If endorsed by students, Worcester said the Kansas Board of Regents must approve the fee increase and the center's construction.

The legislation would then seek acceptance from the Kansas Legislature. Worcester said the project would be delayed until next year if not voted on in November.

The 16,525 square-feet center would be added to the Union's east side. Worcester said it would be completed by fall 2003.

There would be office space for Greek Affairs, Union Program Council, Student Governing Association, multicultural student organizations and about four other organizations.

The three-floor structure also will have 120 cubicle spaces for various campus groups.

The center would also feature conference rooms, a secretarial staff, mailboxes, computer labs, storage space, workrooms and office equipment.

Faculty Senate focuses on discrimination

By CRISTINA JANNEY
Kansas State Collegian

Faculty Senate wants the university to better address issues of harassment and discrimination before they escalate to the level of illegality.

How that should be done has the administration and Senate at odds.

In a task-force report issued in the spring, Senate made recommendations to the administration about how the affirmative action office could be improved.

One of these recommendations was that the university take steps to deal with low-level harassment. However, neither side has a good definition of what that means.

Loosely, it would be behavior that is inappropriate but does not meet the criteria of legal harassment that could be addressed with by the affirmative action office, said Buddy Gray, former Faculty Senate president and member of the Senate Leadership Committee.

If Senate made a list of inappropriate behaviors, someone would do something that would not be on the list, Gray said. Problems should be handled on a case-by-case basis, he said.

Gray was hesitant to give examples because he wanted people to focus on the proposals.

However, he described a scenario in which a female professor had not had the opportunity to teach upper-level courses. The female professor might think she was being discriminated against because of her gender.

If the department head and the professor could discuss the problem, they might find there were other factors besides gender that contributed to the problem, Gray said.

Charles Reagan, associate to the president, said the university wants a climate in which everyone is appreciated, productive and respected.

"We want people to be able to work in an environment that allows them to flourish," he said. "In that respect, there is no difference between us. What differs is what behavior should be sanctioned and and how the process would work."

Reagan said the definitions, process and sanctions for low-level harassment are unclear.

"You can't punish someone for something that is too vague," he said.

Provost James Coffman said such a policy could restrict faculty rights.

"Any time you have a small group defining acceptable behavior, you risk being abused in the future," he said.

Gray said it was not Senate's intent to sanction the creation of a morality police.

The Leadership Committee and administration met last week to discuss the Regents approve transfer of power

By NICK BRATKOVIC
Kansas State Collegian

The Kansas Board of Regents unanimously passed a plan that would give the state's six regent institutions full tuition ownership.

If implemented by the state, regent members said the proposal could be in place in time for fiscal year 2003. The plan will not go through the state Legislature and governor's office until January 2002.

Tom Rawson, K-State vice president for finance, said the plan would put Kansas in line with the way other states fund higher education.

"This would give us the flexibility to manage Kansas State in a way that our colleagues manage universities in other states," Rawson said.

The tuition-ownership plan was part of a larger package on the board's agenda called "Budgetary Reform for the Regents Universities." In that plan, each of the six universities would have control over its own tuition revenue.

The plan, part of the general use concept of budgeting, would be replaced with total tuition ownership. It also would eliminate specific requests to the Legislature for funding to provide salary increases or enrollment adjustments.

Finally, under the block-grant system as stated in the board's agenda, the six regent universities would receive state funding from a general fund block-grant appropriation, and the regents would determine the rate of increase on the block grant.

Regent Sylvia Robinson said all facets of the plan are instrumental in the board's decision to pass the plan.

College life continues to improve for student involved with sorority

By JESSICA PITTS
Kansas State Collegian

College life just seems to keep getting better for Christie Horton, freshmen in open-option.

"At first, I was a little hesitant about everything," Horton said. "But it is definitely getting better. It just takes some time and some effort."

Horton, who pledged Kappa Alpha Theta at the beginning of the semester, recently went through the orientation to become an official member.

"It was a lot of fun, but the activities are a secret that only the members know," Horton said. "I feel good now that I am an official member because now I belong to a group."

Horton said she is glad that she decided to join a sorority because of the instant support group it brings.

"It definitely helped at the beginning of the year to know those girls were there," she said. "I made a lot of friends and I was able to get involved right away."

Kelly Merkel, new member educator for Kappa Alpha Theta, said the sorority members pride themselves in helping the new pledges fit in.

"We try to do sets of Pals, which is where the new girls are paired up with an older girl for a week," said Merkel, junior in food science. "Their Pals usually contact them and they will go out and do something fun together. It is a great way for them to get to know more people and for them to have contacts to talk to within the sorority."

Merkel said the sorority also has new-member meetings that go over some house rules, history of the house and any other topics in which the new pledges are interested to make them feel like they are involved.

"Most tend to fit in real well," Merkel said. "Christie is definitely one of them. She is very active in the house. She comes to activities and really gets involved. I think she is having a a lot of fun because she seems really happy."

Besides her sorority, Horton said she started to meet people on her floor of her residence hall, Boyd Hall.

Residence hall draws student for 2nd year

By MICHELLE BERTUGLIA
Kansas State Collegian

After spending more than half a semester in Moore Hall, one resident said he already plans to live in the hall again next year.

Craig Wanklyn, freshman in architectural engineering and a native of Lakin, Kan., said after 10 weeks he already can see the fun and convenience of living in the residence halls.

Participating in last week's Homecoming activities made Wanklyn realize how much he was enjoying residence hall life.

"People have to know living in the residence halls can be fun," he said.

At the beginning of the semester he said he did not plan on becoming involved much his first year.

Wanklyn is the Moore Hall representative for the Kansas Association of Residence Halls and a member of Moore Hall Governing Board.

Kesha Storey scrambled to fill out her voter registration ballot only a few minutes before the Monday postmark deadline.

She said she didn't mean to wait until the last minute, but the deadline crept up on her.

"I just found out yesterday it was due today," Storey, senior in elementary education, said. "I didn't even realize it was the cut-off day."

Storey wasn't alone, said LaToya Kennedy, secretary with the Office of Student Activities and Services.

"We went through about 2- or 300 ballots today," she said. "We had about 30 to 45 calls asking about it.

"Some people didn't know it was due today. Some just waited."

Registration cards had to be postmarked by Monday to vote in the Nov. 7 general election. Many students didn't pick up forms until right before 5 p.m., and then had to take them to off-campus mail drop-offs, such as the Manhattan Post Office or Dillons stores with later pick-up times to mail them.

Before Monday, Kennedy said about 100 students had picked up registration ballots from the OSAS.

Shelly Roben-Lojka, assistant coordinator for OSAS, said she was pleased with the turnout.

"I am just thrilled people are coming in to do it," she said.

The high numbers were due in part to awareness campaigns by campus groups, she said.

"We've had good efforts by governmental relations committee and other student organizations to inform students of registration and voting," Roben-Lojka said.

Samuel Beiber, sophomore in elementary education, said he registered because he felt it was his duty.

"It's my obligation as a citizen to vote for who we need," he said. "I don't want to be complaining for who we have if I didn't take the initiative to vote."

Voting is something Storey said she takes seriously.

"Our generation and the one after us, we're the ones coming up in the world," she said. "The government needs to be working for our generations."

Candidates face uphill battle with young voters

By KATHERINE PFLEGER
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Arie Deutsch says he's too lazy to get his absentee ballot from New York, so he won't be exercising his right to vote.

"It's not worth the effort," the 20-year-old sophomore at George Washington University said, puffing on a cigarette and soaking in the sun. "They're not talking to my voting age. Seniors' issues, health care, taxes. Students don't pay attention to taxes because they don't pay that much in taxes."

In this year's close race for the presidency, Republican George W. Bush and Democrat Al Gore have an uphill battle if they hope to lure young voters to the polls.

Since the 1960s, the percentage of people 18 to 24 who vote has been declining. In 1964, almost 51 percent of young voters turned out, according to the Census Bureau. In 1996, just under one-third.

Curtis Gans, director of the Committee for the Study of the American Electorate, has an even lower estimate. He figures only 28 percent of young people voted in 1996, and this year will be even lower.

"There is no sign of young people's interest," Gans said. "This generation is into making their own lives better, and that is not consistent to participation."

Analysts say this generation lacks an issue to impassion young voters, such as the Vietnam War. Social Security and Medicare are hardly the fodder for lively debate, let alone a campus protest.

And third party candidates probably won't enliven young voters, as Reform Party candidate Ross Perot did in 1992, said David Rohde, political scientist at Michigan State University.

"The candidates are paying attention (to young voters) at least to the degree that they'd like to turn out the folks who are inclined to support them," he said. "The reality is young people don't turn out."

In the last presidential debate, a professor asked the candidates how they address youth apathy when the issues of the day — Medicare, Social Security or prescription drugs — aren't directed at young voters.

Gore responded with an answer about campaign finance reform, health care and renewable fuels. Bush commented on Medicare, tax cuts and honesty.

Jehmu Greene, spokeswoman for the registration drive Rock the Vote, said the candidates' substance — not style — is the problem.

"It's less about acting hip and trying to come down to the level of young people and more about trying to talk directly to them and having their stances relate to young people," Greene said.

As she has traveled around the Teaching of evolution to be discussed tonight at lecture

A woman known for her support of the teaching of evolution in public schools will speak at K-State tonight.

The lecture will be at 7:30 tonight in Union Forum Hall.

Eugenie Scott, executive director of the National Center of Science Education, is a human biologist who has researched the fields of medical anthropology and skeletal biology.

Scott's lecture is titled, "Why NOT Creationism in Public Schools?"

Linda Teener, UFM executive director, said Scott might have intentionally chosen a vague title to encourage people from both sides of the evolution/creationism debate to attend.

The lecture series committee chose Scott because of recent debate by the Kansas Board of Education on the issue of evolution vs. creationism in public schools, Teener said.

Scott, the author of "Teaching about Evolution and the Nature of Sciences," is expected to focus on the importance of science education in schools.

Bush stops in Kansas City, discusses agriculture plans

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Republican presidential nominee George W. Bush energized more than 500 supporters during a rally at Kansas City's Downtown Airport on Monday morning.

The rally was the nominee's first stop on a Barnstorm for Reform tour, taking him next to Des Moines, Iowa, and Milwaukee.

The Texas governor outlined his plans to reform Social Security, Medicare, education funding and the tax code.

He fielded a half dozen questions from the crowd, drawing the biggest cheers for his remarks about farmers.

He called agriculture a national security issue and promised to end policies that run farmers off their land.

Bush was joined by Govs. Mike Huckabee of Arkansas, Bill Graves of Kansas, Kenny Guinn of Nevada and Bob Taft of Ohio. Taft requested a moment of silence for Missouri's late Gov. Mel Carnahan, a Democrat killed in a plane crash Oct. 16.

Taft said governors work across party lines and that Carnahan was a friend and a colleague.

The text of Bush's speech opened with a paragraph devoted to Carnahan, describing him as "a fine man and a good servant of the people here in Missouri."

"These are such terrible days for his wife, Jean, and the Carnahan family, and they are in our prayers," the text said.

However, Bush did not read that paragraph in delivering his speech. His only mention of Carnahan came in response to a question having to do with the flow of water in the Missouri River.

Clinton signs bill Monday to set drunken driving levels

WASHINGTON, D.C. — President Clinton, after a three-year struggle with Congress, signed a bill Monday that would set a tough national standard for drunken driving and, according to proponents, prevent 500 highway deaths a year.

"For me, this is a very good day for the United States," the president said.

The new law requires states to implement a 0.08 percent blood alcohol content standard as the legal level for drunken driving by 2004.

States that fail to impose that standard would begin losing millions of dollars a year in federal highway funds.

The provision was tucked into a compromise $58 billion transportation spending bill that was stuffed with pre-election highway, mass transit and aviation projects for every state.

A 170-pound man could consume approximately four drinks in an hour on an empty stomach before reaching 0.08 limit, according to National Highway Traffic Safety Administration statistics cited by Mothers Against Drunk Driving.

A 137-pound woman could have three drinks in an hour before reaching 0.08.

Opponents of the 0.08 standard, including the restaurant and alcohol industries, say the measure would penalize social drinkers while ignoring the bigger problem of repeat offenders.

In 1999, 15,786 traffic deaths were attributed to drunken driving, including more than 2,200 children.

The transportation bill's overwhelming passage was fueled by its scores of road, mass transit and aviation projects.

To accommodate that, the measure was $7.3 billion higher than last year's level, $3.3 billion more than Clinton requested and nearly $3 billion larger than earlier versions passed by the House and Senate.

Freshman begins to seek out car, greek life

By NANCY FOSTER
Kansas State Collegian

EVAN SEMON/Collegian

Living away from home, Kyle Yaege said he has learned about one main thing – how people interact differently with each other. He has made a lot of friends, especially at his residence hall. Here he hangs out with Elyas Shaiwani (right), sophomore in computer engineering; Brandon Elliott, freshman in general engineering; and Brad Carpenter, freshman in computer science.

FROM THE BEGINNING

Three time zones away from his parents, Kyle Yaege said he's still not aching for his hometown of Anchorage, Alaska.

"I guess it's just being used to being a little bit away from home," Yaege, freshman in business, said. "I didn't spend a lot of time with my folks much when I was there the last couple of years."

Yaege said that when his high school years were coming to a close, much of his time was spent with his friends — one thing he does miss.

"It was nice hanging out with them," he said. "I haven't talked to quite a few of them in a long time."

Yaege said the fact that all his friends have scattered around the United States has made it difficult to keep touch.

The other thing he said he missed was his mode of transportation.

"I miss my car," he said.

Not bringing a car to college has limited his options of activities, he said. That's why he has begun looking for one.

"You get to feeling a little trapped in the dorm when all you can do is go to places within walking distance or to Aggieville," he said. "And I get sick of bumming rides to Wal-Mart."

Yaege's father, Chris Yaege, said he thought it was a good idea his son was getting a car.

"It's hard to get around in Manhattan without a car," he said, "especially if he wants to go on a date."

Chris Yaege said Kyle decided he needed the car for extracurricular activities. Because of the car issue, Chris Yaege said he had gotten to hear from his son more frequently.

"He's really enjoying being at K-State, and he's having a good time, so we're happy for him," Chris Yaege said.

Chris Yaege said they frequently keep in touch through e-mail, and Kyle said he tries to call home every once in a while to check in.

"Things are working out real good," Chris Yaege said.

"He just seems to be real happy there."

Questions regarding his hometown of Anchorage, Alaska, are still being asked, he said.

"I hear a lot about how cold it is, and does the sun really go down for days on end," he said. "Generally, it's questions about the environment."

He said often times when he says he's from Anchorage, people have to stop and think where it is. Some have even said, "I didn't know Anchorage was in western Kansas."

Yaege said even though he gets a lot of questions, he doesn't get annoyed.

"It's fun to be unique," he said.

Not only is Yaege looking for a car, but he also decided to pledge the Theta Chi fraternity. One month ago, he began considering the idea of joining the greek system to form a network of people he could call friends.

"It's a lot of reliable people," he said. "It's nice to have a place to belong, which is exactly what it did. It's kind of what I was after."

Yaege said he has continued to stay busy with his classes and extracurricular activities.

"It's fun to be busy," he said.

"It's better to be busy than being bored in the room playing on the computer or watching TV."

He said one advantage he's had is having family nearby. His grandmother, who lives on a nearby farm, has been great to have around.

"I generally make it a habit to go out there in the afternoons on Sundays, when it's generally boring around here anyway," he said.

As for K-State and Manhattan in general, Yaege said everyone has continued to be friendly. In fact, Yaege only had one complaint.

"There aren't enough 18-and-over bars," he said.

Being away from home, Yaege said he has learned one main thing — how people interact differently with each other.

"There are still stereotypes that people pick out for themselves," he said. "Everybody kind of picks a role, and that's what they play. It doesn't change from where you are on the globe."

Government reviews Web privacy policy

By D. IAN HOPPER
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The Clinton administration is stepping up efforts to ensure the government protects Americans' personal privacy after a congressional report alleged federal agencies electronically track users online.

When asked about the report, which said 13 federal agencies ignored a directive against tracking visitors to government Web sites, White House spokesman Jake Siewert said the administration is starting to keep tabs on agencies.

"What we've done concretely is to ask them, when they submit their budget requests in December, to give us an update on exactly where they are in the process and how they're correcting their policy if it's out of compliance with our regulations," Siewert told reporters.

Siewert and the White House's Office of Management and Budget made a distinction — also made in the original General Accounting Office study — between helpful tracking by electronic cookies and secretive collection of information.

In a letter responding to the GAO, the budget office's deputy director for management, Sally Katzen, said some of the cookies used on federal sites are helpful, similar to shopping cart cookies on a retailer's Web site.

On an Education Department site, cookies help student loan recipients fill out applications and consolidate their loans online. The U.S. Mint shopping site also uses cookies to keep track of purchases.

Since the original June order, officials have attempted to redefine how the government should use cookies that enhance a Web site visitor's experience but not intrude on privacy.

Forbidden are so-called persistent cookies, which track Web habits over years, and the dissemination of a person's information to a private company. Congressional investigators found seven federal agencies that used one or both of those methods.

Federal agencies might have to report their progress to Congress as well as the White House.

Advertisements do not represent opinion of paper

There is a world of difference between news and advertising.

News is the facts, from the hard stuff to light features. It is the events we report.

Advertising is more opinion. Just because the Collegian runs an advertisement does not mean that the staff supports or endorses the views of those who fund these ads.

Advertisements are sponsorships, not endorsements.

A few weeks ago, the Collegian contained an insert for Yahoo! that some readers found offensive. The ad carried a message from one guy to another in regards to a woman undressing.

This was met with some response — for the most part negative. Yet it is important to keep in mind that this was a message from Yahoo! and not the Collegian.

The paper you are reading is paid for by a variety of things. A minimal amount of it is paid for by student privileged fees. The majority of it is paid through advertising.

This not only benefits students who are able to read the campus and local news, but the ads benefit students in need of campus updates. This is essential for updating many students who attend K-State.

Some of the inserts have contact information on them for both positive and negative feedback. For those inserts that don't, the Collegian can help you obtain ways to contact the sponsors.

If you disagree with any of the Collegian's ads, please contact those who paid for it. Also, remember to keep in mind the difference between the facts and opinions.

A Parking Paradise

Carpooling plan could provide more than 690 new parking spots around campus

ZAC COOK

I'm spoiled. I'll admit it. I come from Plains, Kan., the town with the "Widest Main Street in the USA." My whole town can drive downtown, park with spots to spare and not worry. It's a luxury. My small-town parking can accommodate a lot more action than it is seeing. I'm sad that K-State's parking resources aren't quite as abundant, because everyone knows the parking spaces on campus are overworked.

But who says you can't make do if you aren't as well endowed as the others? K-State Parking Services has tried to make our parking area seem bigger than it is by adding a few spots behind the Sigma Sigma Sigma house and making plans for a temporary lot to cushion the situation before a shuttle system comes along. So it seems we have solved our parking problem. A little addition here and there, wait for the shuttle system, and we're in John-Bobbitt-tip-top-shape ready for action.

Or are we? The proposed lot north of Weber Hall would add a total of 283 stalls at a total cost of around $400,000. The rationale is that the 283 new spots would attract commuters from the most congested parts of campus and make parking all over campus better as a whole.

However, the reality is that all the people now forced to park on off campus streets due to the horrible situation would be back on campus looking for a spot. Kevin Costner would be able to figure this one out: build it and they will come. It's that simple. The new lot would offer no incentive to change. People still would be lazy and drive to campus individually. There would be no disincentive to the laziness common to so many spoiled Kansans. We would be back to square one.

I think there is a better way to open up spots on campus and also prepare students for use of the transit system that will be operating by fall 2002. I first proposed it two years ago in a letter to the editor. However, my plan lay dormant until this fall, when I visited the University of Washington, where 55,000 students fight for 12,000 parking spots, and saw the utopia of a successful carpooling system.

Here's how it would work at K-State under Cook's carpooling plan. Central lots on campus would allow no single drivers, except for those who purchased a $600 reserved stall. The most central lots, such as A-6, would require four people per vehicle. Others, such as A-28, would require two or three people. The only lots allowing single drivers would be B-17 and D-1. That's it, the whole plan. Surprisingly simple. Any questions?

Will the plan be flexible? Yes. Current permit prices would remain the same and everyone would still be required to own a permit to park on campus. Except that when you and three of your buddies jump in the car, you know you will have a guaranteed spot right next to the library in A-6. You would have a plastic display to put your four permits in and hang it in the window. After returning home, you simply pull your permit out and you are free to ride with someone else the next day.

What if I have trouble finding riding partners? All you have to do is get on KATS, punch in what times you need to go and return from campus and where you live and hit enter. The system will match you with someone who needs the same times and lives in the same zone. New friends and no hassle parking solutions. What more could you ask for? Hakuna matata!

What about people already carpooling who don't own permits? These people could complain about the extra $60 they would have to shell out, but they shouldn't complain at all because parking will just be that much easier for them. Also, the system will be more geared towards a bus system when every student will have a pass.

So exactly how many spots will this plan free up and how much will it cost? Ahh, the true beauty of my plan. Even if it was only used in the Durland (Lot A-28), Union (Lot A-30), and Justin (Lot A-5) parking areas, the plan would provide 690 more spots in the outer lots (B-17 and D-1). But unlike the temporary lot, there is no limiting number. Every carpool of two, three, or four people opens up that many spots somewhere else on campus.

Costs? What costs? This plan won't require more money, just cooperation and a will to end laziness.

I guess the only real question is — who gets the $400,000? In election spirit, I'd be happy to have your vote.

This is my question: if the Student Union is the "gateway to the university," why does the parking lot look so dirty all of the time? And why is it so small? I can never find a parking place.

I'm guessing you are saying Clinton was a good Democrat? Right.

Yeah, facilities, you need to rake the sand traps on the sidewalks. I've seemed to have lost my nine iron somewhere on campus.

Independent filmmaker true alternate candidate

CLINT MUDRICK

I am not voting for Ralph Nader.

I realize that "Nader for president" is among the hottest fads to hit campus since capris, but I made the mistake of examining the man's political stances, and as a result lost all interest in him. It is my belief that some Nader supporters like him simply because he is perceived as different (which, as I will explain later, he is not), but I have come to the conclusion that if difference is the only thing worth voting on, I wish to endorse a much more viable "different" candidate: independent film director Kevin Smith.

Let us examine both candidates. Ralph Nader is admirable because he doesn't accept contributions from big business. This admirable trait, however, loses luster when Nader can't complete a sentence in an interview or on his homepage without pointing it out. Whatever happened to being noble and quiet?

Kevin Smith is noble because, in a sea of movies that spend hundreds of millions in attempts to dazzle the audience with special effects while leaving out a plot, he spent a mere $10 million on "Dogma," his biggest production. Moreover, he didn't mention this fact every time he was interviewed and the information is hard to find anywhere except hidden away in news groups.

Ralph Nader is "different" because he is willing to take a stand on issues. The reality is that he simply sidesteps the big topics. Rather than focus on foreign policy, Nader discusses Makah Whaling, a truly vital subject. Instead of pivoting his campaign on the death penalty, Nader is more secure talking about cleaner gas (because if there's one thing I need, it is to pay more money per gallon). It turns out that, on the issues Gore and Bush focus on, Nader also follows the prevailing views; he is considered different because he focuses on the stuff other people don't tend to think of, mainly because they aren't the most important issues.

Kevin Smith rarely takes a stance on any huge issues. On occasion he slips a gem of morality into his movies (gay rights in "Chasing Amy," religious tolerance in "Dogma"), but is more adept with focusing on the smaller, more "important" issues, such as whether Lois Lane could have Superman's baby (a la "Mallrats") or, as discussed in "Clerks," whether the rebel alliance had the right to kill the janitors in the Death Star ("they're just taking orders"). If it is the important issues students want, Smith covers them all.

Another reason some rally behind Nader is the "common American" persona he carries. The man has fought for the little guy for decades, has fought for airbags, powerful unions and an end to those evil corporations that gainfully employ so many Americans. While his pro-worker platform is a carbon copy of Gore's, it is nonetheless one that should be discussed. Nader is no fan of corporate America, but his remedy for big business involves steps that would cripple corporations.

If you are looking to make a statement that you support a guy who is only superficially different, vote Nader. But if you are in the market for a guy who can make a Ben Affleck movie for less than a quarter of a million dollars ("Chasing Amy," a classic) write "Kevin Smith" on that ballot.

A man does not come more common than Kevin Smith. In his movies, he focuses on the meek of the Earth. In "Clerks," he shows the struggles of common retail store employees. "Chasing Amy" follows the hardships a comic book tracer and his friend face in the world of still animation. "Mallrats" follows two unemployed and worthless young men (how much more common do you get?) through a mall in a truly romantic quest to get their respective girls back. "Dogma" is about your typical angels cast from heaven who ... well, never mind about "Dogma."

Smith's distaste for big business also is much more subtle and sensible. "Clerks" involves a downtrodden convenience store worker who rebels against his hostile workforce not by joining a large and hopelessly bureaucratic union but rather by closing the store for a game of hockey on the shop's roof. Such proactive and sensible thinking is much more suitable for a White House position than Nader's.

Kevin Smith has supplied America with a bevy of contributions. Chief among these are his characters. Jay, Silent Bob, Brodie and "Chasing Amy's" Alyssa are so incredibly more multi-dimensional than Nader that comparison would be laughable. Additionally, while Nader sticks with the hopelessly bland and patronizing "Government of, by and for the people ... not moneyed interests," Smith offers the sincere and defining "Snootchie Boochie Noochies!" Need I say more?

Finally, for a running mate, Nader has chosen Winona LaDuke, a Harvard-educated intellectual who has little to her name save a environmentalist propaganda. While Kevin Smith has yet to name a running mate (mainly because he is unaware he is being endorsed for president), I believe he would team him up with the lovable Silent Bob. While it might seem odd for a man to run with his own movie alter ego as his running mate, I would rather have a quiet fictional tubby veep than LaDuke any day.

If you are looking to make a statement that you support a guy who is only superficially different, vote Nader. But if you are in the market for a guy who can make a Ben Affleck movie for less than a quarter of a million dollars ("Chasing Amy," a classic) write "Kevin Smith" on that ballot. As Brodie, his character for the masses, said in response to the notion that women want romance, not Disney World's Mr. Toad's Wild Ride, "Be fair. Everybody wants Mr. Toad's Wild Ride."

Student readjusts to attending school

By APRIL MIDDLETON
Kansas State Collegian

KAREN MIKOLS/Collegian

Kim Boyd, freshman in business, studies for a College Algebra test during a help session at Cardwell Hall. Boyd said she is having some difficulty balancing her school life with volunteering with church activities, as well as finding time to spend with her family.

FROM THE BEGINNING

It didn't happen overnight, but Kimberly Boyd, freshman in business, has been reassured that returning to school was a good idea.

Boyd started classes at K-State as a part-time student this fall after being out of school since high school. Boyd, an employee of a local accounting firm, has three children who are active in extracurricular activities, and she and her husband are youth directors at their church.

Midterms have helped Boyd realize her dream to earn a bachelor's degree in business is achievable.

Boyd has taken her first two College Algebra tests and written her first two English papers. Although she admits it didn't come easy, she has done well.

"I got a B on my first algebra test and an A on my paper," Boyd said. "Needless to say, I was ecstatic."

Boyd said college hasn't been easy, but at least now she knows it's possible.

"After doing so well I was assured that I could do this," she said.

Doing well in school has always been important to Boyd, who graduated 11th in her graduating high school class of about 250.

"School has always been important to me," Boyd said. "When I was in high school I always had high grades. It wasn't even anything I thought about back then."

Although high grades and mastering material came easy to Boyd in high school, she said she didn't expect it to be as easy in college.

College, she said, has been a whole new game.

"High school was a cake walk. I mean, I had tough times, but it was good," Boyd said. "I knew when I started college it wasn't going to be anything like it, especially when I've been out of school for so long."

Nancy Bolsen, director of adult student services, said that although doing well in high school often reflects how traditional students will do in college, the same theory isn't always true for adults returning to school.

"When adults come back to school or start college later in life, their experience in the real world of work has outweighed what they did in school," she said.

Bolsen said adult students sometimes have an advantage due to work experience. Nontraditional students possess organizational and problem-solving skills, maturity, focus and purpose that contribute to their academic success.

"Adult students know how to use the resources available to them that will enhance their grade potential," Bolsen said. "More than anything, they aren't afraid to ask questions."

Boyd has started on the right track with her education. Her grades have been good and she has found help where she needed it.

When her busy schedule allows, Boyd sits in on help sessions before tests and sometimes attends other class lectures to reiterate the material covered in her section.

"When I have gotten good grades it has been such a thrill," Boyd said. "But it really has been a struggle, and so far, it's not getting any easier."

Boyd is able to accept that returning to school has added even more to her busy schedule. It was a choice she made because she wants to do it she said.

"I want to do this and I want to succeed at it. Most days I actually look forward to going to class," Boyd said. "It's exciting to go to class and see how well I can do. I love the whole learning process, even if I don't always understand the material."

Her family, Boyd said, has been supportive. They are able to understand her schedule and cooperate to make the situation work.

"We've made it through everything else," she said. "This will just be another obstacle we'll find our way through."

Foreign student settles in with life, classes at K-State

MICHAEL YOUNG/Collegian

Paulina Castillejos, freshman in business, and member of the K-State women's tennis team awaits a serve during a singles scrimmage Monday afternoon during practice. Enrolled in 16 hours of courses, Castillejos is finding a way to juggle between tennis, school and acquainting herself with K-State.

By BRYAN MURPHY
Kansas State Collegian

With the semester halfway through, many freshmen at K-State have been able to adjust to the college scene after nearly two months of studying, tests, and just staying busy. Paulina Castillejos, freshman in business, is no exception.

Castillejos, a native of Mexico and member of K-State's tennis team, said her first semester here is going smoothly. Outside of tennis and the classroom, she has grasped the opportunity to make new friends. One of these is her roommate in West Hall, Sarah Geer.

Geer, freshman in business, said she has gotten to know Castillejos better in the past month, and during that month, both have been able to become good friends and help each other become better acquainted with K-State.

"She's really nice and down to earth," Geer said. "Although I get to see her a lot, she's a very busy person. She always seems to be going somewhere or coming from somewhere."

"Sarah is just really nice to me. We've both been a good influence on each other, and I'm just glad I got the chance to know her."

Paulina Castillejos, freshman in business

One of the opportunities they take to spend time together is during one of their classes. Both are in an introductory computing information systems course, and they said they study together for the class.

"It was actually kind of funny," Geer said. "One time, the professor had a virus in the computer and couldn't figure out what was wrong for the longest time. Paulina and I just couldn't stop laughing."

Geer said having a K-State athlete for a roommate is just like getting to know anyone else.

"For me, I'm just glad to have such a nice roommate," Geer said. "Other people seem to look at it as something out of the ordinary, but if they got to know Paulina, they would feel the same way I do."

Amber Page, sophomore in bakery science and resident assistant in West Hall, said she likes having Castillejos live near her.

"When I heard that she was moving up to the floor I was on, I was just really excited for the chance to meet somebody else," Page said. "We're just happy to have her, and I think she will only add to the great atmosphere that we have here already."

Castillejos herself is happy about the attention she is getting and said she is simply glad to have been able to fit in so far at K-State.

"I think that it's been going okay with regards to both classes and tennis," Castillejos said. "I'm just glad to be here, and the people are great."

Castillejos is taking 16 hours of courses, and although this is considered a lot of work for a freshman athlete, Castillejos said it really has not been that difficult.

"I find my geography class to be pretty difficult sometimes because it is hard to keep up at times and take good notes," she said. "But I'm really getting better at it, and it's a lot easier now than it was at the beginning of the semester."

Castillejos said everyone she has encountered at K-State has made her feel very welcome, especially her roommate.

"Sarah is just really nice to me," she said. "We've both been a good influence on each other, and I'm just glad I got the chance to know her."

K-State volleyball team defeats Iowa State in 3 games, allowing 9 points

By MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

If the Iowa State volleyball team hadn't shown up for its match against K-State on Saturday, the final score wouldn't have been much different.

The Wildcats (14-5, 8-3) easily swept the Cyclones (2-18, 0-11) and allowed nine points for the entire match, winning the three games 15-2, 15-6, 15-1.

Iowa State struggled to achieve any kind of offensive rhythm, and the majority of its points were due to K-State errors and ineffective offensive plays, outside hitter Liz Wegner said.

"It's a matter of us giving them points versus them earning the points," she said.

As a result of the Cyclones' struggles, it would have been easy for the Cats to play down to the level of their opponent, but they avoided that temptation, head coach Jim McLaughlin said.

"One of the foundations of this program is a seriousness versus every opponent, and then maintaining an intensity or drive to help us improve," he said Saturday. "These are matches that are tough to do that in, but I thought we did it today. And I think that's a sign of a good team."

Because of their dominating performance, the Cats were able to give several younger players more time on the court. Freshman Cari Jensen, for instance, had played in only one game in the last five matches, but started against Iowa State. Earlier in the season, Jensen hit the ball well but struggled to put together a complete game. The change in playing time was due to her improvement in digging and passing, Wegner said.

"She did a real good job. She went in there and she had a good pass, and she hasn't been doing that in the some of the recent games," Wegner said. "I thought she did a tremendous job of coming in and handling the pressure."

Her improvement in those areas since the beginning of the season was just the result of practicing, Jensen said.

"In practice, I've been having some more time to just get a lot of reps. I've been watching film a lot, too," she said. "Seeing what I'm doing wrong on film helps a lot."

Jensen actually got the start due to the absence of outside hitter Jenny Pollard, who sat out the match due to a muscle strain in her back. The junior could have played through the injury, however, but the rest will allow her to recuperate more quickly, McLaughlin said.

"We didn't want to play her today. She just needed to stay down and get a day of rest," he said. "For some reason, the muscles are not responding as fast we want them to, so rest is the key. The treatment is awesome, but we've got to get her off her feet."

Statistics, talents of players show Texas Tech underrated

FRANK FLATON

Here's the unimaginable thought of the day: Texas Tech is a good football team. Don't laugh. I'm serious.

Following K-State's sloppy 28-23 win over the Red Raiders, K-State fans were disenchanted, if not upset, by K-State's lackluster performance, while media called the Wildcats' play a "hangover" from their 41-31 loss to Oklahoma.

While both are perfectly reasonable responses, neither might not be entirely fair to K-State.

Why, you ask? Because Texas Tech might be one of the most underrated football teams in the Big 12. Make no mistake about it, Texas Tech coach Mike Leach has no pushover in Lubbock.

Consider the statistics. Oh, and consider Red Raider quarterback Kliff Kingsbury.

The lanky signal-caller is averaging a lofty 271.1 yards per game through the air. He has passed for 2,194 yards and is completing 60 percent of his passes.

He's no Josh Heupel, but keep in mind he's just a sophomore. Nevertheless, he exhibited poise and confidence in a tight game against one of the best defenses in college football, rattling the Cats for 302 yards and two touchdowns.

The performance put him at fifth in the nation in passing (K-State's best friend Heupel is 10th).

Kingsbury isn't the most impressive part of the Texas Tech attack, either. Texas Tech's defense is ranked ninth in the country, and it lived up to every part of that bill against the Cats on Saturday.

The small but quick defensive ends put pressure on Jonathan Beasley all day, keeping him to 160 passing yards — one of his worst performances of the season. This isn't a surprise, though.

Texas Tech is ranked first in passing defense, allowing just 989 yards, 123.6 yards per game this season.

Put these weapons with coach Mike Leach, one of the nation's premier offensive wizards, and you have a team that can beat anyone if they show up. Who else can take credit for not one, but two of the nation's best passing attacks?

Bob Stoops' passing attack at OU was designed by Leach, an offensive coordinator last season.

Yes, K-State isn't playing its best football right now. They looked confused against the Sooners and easily could have been upset by an unranked Red Raider team Saturday.

The defense has reeked immensely and the offense has looked out of place.

But don't start criticizing the Wildcats. Don't give up on the purple. Don't assume their season is down the drain and that the Cats have lost their will to succeed.

K-State fans have to realize the Wildcats aren't going to blow out every opponent. Misfortunes happen when you play good competition.

The Wildcats blew through the first half of the season, but now the season gets interesting at the heart of the Big 12 campaign, playing good teams like Oklahoma, Texas Tech and Texas A&M.

K-State has to overcome its woes, but don't expect 40-point blowouts. Don't expect teams to roll over. As Snyder put it in a press conference, "Anyone can beat anyone on any given night."

Especially in the Big 12.

Many believe the worst of the Wildcats' problems are over. And they might be. Now, though, the ante has been risen. The competition isn't laying over and the most important part of the season is still on the line.

The Wildcats can't rely on the blowouts anymore. They have to dig deep within and prove that they really are better than everyone else.

English meet successful for equestrian

By STEVEN DEARINGER
Kansas State Collegian

In its first competition as a varsity sport, K-State's English equestrian team started things off on the right foot with first-, second- and third-place performances this weekend in Stillwater, Okla.

In the first show Saturday morning, the Wildcats scored 27 points to place first as the high-point team, following that with a reserve high-point performance Saturday night in a second-place finish. On Sunday morning, the team scored 26 points to take third.

"I'm very happy with the girls, and they are going to be a dominant force in the Big 12 and the region," Mary Ann Thomas Funk, English equestrian coach, said. "They gave 100-percent effort this weekend."

Kara Jagels, senior novice rider, led the way for K-State.

"Kara Jagels did well and tied for high-point rider in two out of three shows," Funk said.

High-point rider is determined by the highest number of points compared to all other divisions.

Jagels placed first in four of her six rides and second in the other two rides.

During the weekend, she accumulated enough points to move from the novice class into the intermediate division while also qualifying for regionals.

"I was impressed with the quality of horses they had," Jagels said. "In my division, they were not that difficult, which makes it easier to ride well and look good to the judges."

K-State had several riders who placed first in their division: senior Erin Ferriter, senior Kristy Rue, sophomore Maureen Reynolds and junior Angie Guglielmino.

Reynolds came within two points of moving up to the open division.

"I drew good horses, so it helped me perform well," Ferriter said. "One thing I need to work on is being more adaptive to riding different horses, because it is the luck of the draw."

The English team has plenty of work to do before they travel to Texas A&M on Dec. 2-3 for a two hunter event, Funk said.

"We are going to switch to different practice horses. We'll get the girls working on more advanced horses for the beginners and give the advanced riders more variety," Funk said. "After six weeks of practice, we have reached the level to be able to do that."

UP NEXT

K-State's English equestrian team will return to action Dec. 2-3 at Texas A&M. Western competition resumes Oct. 27-28 at West Texas A&M.

Women's rowing finishes in highest position for team at Boston regatta

By DAN SMITH
Kansas State Collegian

K-State's women's rowing team spent the Homecoming weekend in Boston, for what is known as the largest two-day rowing event in the world: The Head of the Charles.

More than 300,000 fans on the shores of the Charles River watched as the Wildcat crew finished 17th out of 57 boats, their best finish ever.

"Our goal was to break through the top 20," head coach Jenny Hale said. "I'm really proud of the way the team stuck with its goal. We're really happy for them."

The team of coxswain Mo McGrath, Josie McClellan, Samantha Allen, Carissa Land, Missy Darnell, Alyssa Adams, Kelli White, Katie Baxter, Katy Bockelman and Glenna Yokum finished the three-mile course with a time of 17:38.36, 2.13 seconds faster than Big 12 rival Texas.

McGrath said she was pleased with the team's performance, and said it was the product of mental preparation.

"Coming off of two rocky practices, we put everything aside," McGrath said. "We rode as one single unit the whole race."

Just one week ago at the American Royal Fall Rowing Classic in Kansas City, Mo., the team won every race in which they were entered, giving the team high expectations for the Cats' fourth consecutive trip to Boston for the regatta.

Iowa City will be host to the Wildcats next weekend, when K-State will compete in the Head of the Iowa against the Hawkeyes, a familiar team from this weekend's field. Iowa finished 10th in Boston with a time of 17:06.46.

Hale said the team's finish at the Head of the Iowa regatta could tell the tale for the rest of the season.

"Iowa is always a great barometer," Hale said of next weekend's matchup. "If we can hang with Iowa, that is great for our program."

Fox, ABC schedule to show next 2 KSU football games

Those K-State fans without tickets will get the opportunity to watch Wildcat football in action on TV against both Texas A&M and Iowa State this season.

Saturday's game against the Aggies in College Station, Texas, is scheduled to appear on ABC, with kick-off set for 2:30 p.m. CDT.

In addition, the Nov. 4 contest with the Cyclones at KSU Stadium will be broadcast on Fox's syndication package, with air time scheduled for 11:30 a.m. local time.

The Iowa State game will mark the first time this season that K-State will appear in a morning game on the regional over-the-air syndication package.

Candace Walton: KSDB-FM 91.9 station manager

WALTON

Candace Walton isn't the voice heard on the campus radio station, but she oversees almost everything that happens on and off the air.

Walton, KSDB-FM 91.9 station manager, supervises all activities at KSDB including production, promotion, talk shows, sales and programming and she trains and advises the student staff.

Walton, who came to K-State in 1997 as the assistant station manager, took over as an interim station manager in 1998 and then became the station manager in August.

Walton also is a member of the journalism and mass communications faculty and teaches two journalism classes.

She said she enjoys her position at K-State.

"Everybody's very friendly," she said. "They make me feel at home even though I'm a Husker fan."

When she's not supervising the station, Walton participates in two bowling leagues and spends time with her three dogs, Wiley, Lady and Shadow.

She and her husband, Ryan, also spend time fixing up their house in Wamego.

If you have a suggestion for an interesting person to profile in brief, contact the arts and entertainment editor at arts@spub.ksu.edu.

STEVEN DEARINGER/Collegian

Julie (left) and Christi Nelson, both freshmen in business, still live at home and said they only miss out on one thing: meeting new people.

Two of a kind

Twins choose to experience 1st year of college from home

By CHELSEA SCHMIDT
Kansas State Collegian

They look alike, they talk alike and they even attend the same classes.

But Julie and Christi Nelson, both freshmen in business, are different than a majority of K-State students for one main reason — they still live at home.

"There's really nothing bad about it," Christi said. "We don't have any less freedom."

The Nelson twins said they are enjoying the luxury of home-cooked meals, free laundry and being close to home all for one small price.

"I like it but I feel like we've missed out on meeting people," Julie said.

Living in the residence halls or joining a sorority would have given them a better opportunity to meet people, Julie said, but the benefits of living at home outweigh the costs.

"It gives you the opportunity to get used to being in college," she said. "It would have been too much stress to live away from home."

Christi said the decision to live at home was an easy one.

"Our mom said we could move out if we wanted, but I don't have any money," Christi said.

Both Julie and Christi work at Dillon's in the Westloop Shopping Center and plan to get an apartment with some friends next year. But Christi said she predicts living in an apartment won't be much different than living at home.

"It wouldn't give us much more freedom," she said. "We'll just be paying for stuff on our own."

They said talking about their living arrangement with people they meet can sometimes cause the conversation to become a little awkward.

Christi said people are not rude about it, but sometimes they don't understand how two college students can bear to live at home.

"They always ask things like, 'What time do you have to be home?' and 'So, do you have a lot of rules?'" she said.

But, to the Nelson twins, it's like living in an apartment, only with parents.

"A lot of people think it is a punishment to live at home, but I don't see anything wrong with it," Christi said.

Nancy Wilson, the twins' mother, said she is happy with their decision to live at home.

"It's nice to have them around, even though I don't see them much," she said. "They can live here as long as they want."

Wilson said she does not enforce a curfew for two reasons.

"They've always been real responsible and they are usually together," she said. "They take care of each other."

The twins said joining the Greek system or living in the residence halls never really was an option they were interested in.

"I don't think it's really me," Christi said. "I didn't know if I'd like it."

> "We always have someone to do something with."
> Julie Nelson, freshman in business

Both said they agreed it is a slight disadvantage that they do not have access to a bunch of people within walking distance to study or hang out with, as they would if they had chosen an alternative living situation.

"I've heard from people who live in the dorms or sororities that they always have people to help them with their assignments," Christi said.

But, since Julie and Christi attend the same classes, they said they have each other they can turn to for help. And, they don't have any trouble finding a quiet place to study.

The Nelson twins have more in common than just being identical; they are friends, too. This helps when trying to find something to do, Julie said.

"We always have someone to do something with," she said.

Although they both enjoy living at home while attending their first year of college, they said there are some disadvantages that come with it, including driving to and from campus every day.

Overall, the Julie and Christi said they were enjoying their first taste of college and have not found living at home to be a hindrance. Julie said she would encourage those who have the opportunity to take it.

"There's nothing wrong with it at all," Julie said. "If you have the opportunity, you should go with it."

Roller hockey club looks to build on early success

By DAN SMITH
Kansas State Collegian

K-State's roller hockey club might not be one of the most well-known sports teams around campus, but it is quickly becoming one of the most successful.

After starting its season on the right foot with an impressive 4-0 record, the team is hopeful it can compete well in the Great Plains Collegiate Inline Hockey League this season, senior Jeff Wilke said.

Twenty-five players from K-State and surrounding areas, including Fort Riley and Junction City, make up the club that travels to Skate City in Junction City each Thursday night to practice for the team's weekend games throughout the season.

However, the team hasn't always had the luxury of practicing comfortably, or even on a rink.

Wilke, team president, said the squad has had to grow into the team's new facilities and still remembers just four short years ago when practices were not even indoors.

"When we started playing when I got up here, we were playing on the tennis courts between Goodnow and Marlatt Hall," Wilke said of the team's rather rustic past.

That past, however, provides the team with lofty goals for this season, that the team expects to achieve, Wilke said.

After two years in the GPCIHL, he said the Cats are satisfied with what they have accomplished so far and are aiming even higher for this season.

"Last year we did real well, we got some good new players in, and we finished third in the league," Wilke said. "Everybody knows that we want to win it all this year, and I believe that we have a good shot at it. I don't believe everybody knew it until this weekend, but we beat the team that was the defending champion, and we handled them 7-3."

Wilke, a civil engineering major, was impressed with the team's start to the season, which began last weekend in St. Louis, where the Cats beat three teams they had never beaten before — defending Great Plains champion Truman State, Central Missouri State and Merrimac.

"We had a pretty tough schedule last weekend, and we didn't know what to expect," Wilke said. "We had three of the top teams from last year to play and we beat them all."

Jeremy Murphy, graduate student in business, said the team's early success isn't a fluke. Murphy said the team's talent is impressive, and the team is jelling now more than ever.

"By far, this is the best team we've had since I've been here, we have a lot more guys who know how to move the puck and pass and position themselves right."

MICHAEL YOUNG/Collegian

Todd Young, member of the K-State roller hockey club, looks on during one of the team's practices at Skate City. Twenty-five players from K-State and the surrounding areas make up the team.

Murphy said the team chemistry also is stronger than in years past, which might be why the Cats have been able to have success this early.

"We're more in-sync with each other, and we've acquired a lot of guys that help the team — we're clicking well," Murphy said.

He said he hopes the team can build on that chemistry to establish a bond that will help the club go undefeated this year, a goal Murphy said is realistic because of the competition the team already has faced.

"Hopefully, we can win the rest of the games," Murphy said. "We've played the hardest teams, and we outplayed the best team badly, 7-3."

Sooners, Cornhuskers to meet in top 10 for 1st time since 1989

By OWEN CANFIELD
The Associated Press

NORMAN, Okla. — Nebraska-Oklahoma is big again. It's been a while.

Saturday's game between the top-ranked Cornhuskers and the No. 3 Sooners will mark the 13th time that one or the other has been ranked No. 1 when they met. This will be the 17th time both teams have been ranked among the top 10, but the first since 1988.

The Nebraska-Oklahoma game determined the Big Eight champion 27 times in a 29-year span, and often had a bearing on the national championship. But with the formation of the Big 12, the teams no longer play each other every year — this is the first meeting since 1997.

And Oklahoma hasn't given Nebraska anything to worry about lately. The Cornhuskers have won seven straight in the series, and they embarrassed Oklahoma in the past three, winning by a margin of 179-28, including 69-7 in 1997 — the worst loss in school history.

"To be able to come here at 6-0 is kind of astonishing, people can't hardly believe it, after what happened the last few years," said Johnny Pellow, president of Oklahoma's varsity club.

Pellow played football at Oklahoma from 1956 to 58, and lost just two games. He was part of the Bud Wilkinson era, which was followed years later by the Barry Switzer era. Each of those coaches won three national titles.

But Switzer's final season was 1988, and Oklahoma has been out of the national championship picture ever since. While Nebraska was winning consecutive national titles during the 1990s, Oklahoma was going through three coaches before settling on Bob Stoops after the 1998 season.

"You can tell there's an extra amount of excitement right now in the air," Oklahoma quarterback Josh Heupel said. "We came in after the K-State game and we've got, I would guess, 1,000-plus fans waiting for us at the stadium. People are talking about the program, talking about the game and the importance of it."

Oklahoma beat then-No. 2 K-State 41-31 two weeks ago to remain unbeaten. The Sooners had last weekend off, while Nebraska improved to 7-0 with a 59-0 victory over Baylor.

Few would have expected this game to be so big at the start of the season, since Oklahoma began the year ranked No. 19. But the Sooners climbed to No. 10 before beating 11th-ranked Texas 63-14, then jumped to No. 3 with the victory over K-State.

"It's back in the days of people expecting to win. Not hoping, but expecting," former Oklahoma quarterback Jack Mildren said. "I think the fans were looking for just a small glimmer and they got it (last year). When they beat Kansas State, that was a bigtime glimmer."

Heupel said he remembers the Nebraska-Oklahoma games of the mid-1980s.

"I remember it being a huge football game, with conference and national championship implications," he said. " I grew up in South Dakota, where a lot of Nebraska fans tend to be, so I remember the rivalry quite well.

"There's a respect between the two schools, but it's not the biggest love fest, either."

Mildren said that amid the excitement, it is wise to remember that the opponent is Nebraska.

"They're not playing somebody who can't win," he said. "These guys have done it year after year after year. And yet I think if you walked out of your office and took a poll, I think most Oklahomans would say they think Oklahoma will win. I do."

WANKLYN

settled," he said. "I knew I would be busy with school, but I did not realize I would be as busy as I am."

Over the last few weeks, Wanklyn has made it his personal crusade to get others involved in the activities Moore Hall has for its residents.

"A stereotype has been formed about dorms," he said. "We are a residence hall, not a dorm. The word 'dorm' puts a bad spin on the place. This is our place to run and live in."

Renee Crist, a residence assistant in Moore Hall and junior in social work, said she thinks Wanklyn has become so involved in Moore life because he enjoys seeing other people get involved.

"I think being involved is who he is," Crist said. "He is very much a people person and wants to see others getting involved, it makes him happy."

John Carter, resident assistant in Moore Hall and senior in architectural engineering, said Wanklyn's attitude is moving.

"For a freshman to be as involved as he is, is impressive," he said. "He is always energetic and willing to sign up for stuff."

Carter said he thinks Wanklyn's drive to be so involved came from his extensive involvement in high school activities.

After being around Wanklyn during the past few weeks, Crist said he has come out of his shell.

"I think at first he was really shy, but after he found himself he became comfortable with being here," Crist said.

Crist said Wanklyn's commitment and dedication to the hall and academics is a unusual trait for freshmen.

"Lots of freshmen are working on themselves, getting themselves acclimated," she said. "He is the person who looks out for others."

Wanklyn said he is trying to make the most of his time here.

He said it is the reason he has been interested in getting involved with everything he can.

"I have seen lots of pictures of people working on Homecoming stuff, and that made me want to get involved," he said. "We are here to get more people to spread the enthusiasm about residence hall life. The more people you can get involved with events like Homecoming, the more fun you have. I am not exactly sure what I am getting myself into, but it will be fun."

REGENTS

"We wanted it to be considered in its entirety, and not pieces broken out, it has to be a complete package," she said. "It would allow K-State to own tuition that it collects."

Regent Janice DeBauge said the plan would mean more flexibility to K-State and other universities.

"This allows them to be more flexible in funding, and how dollars are spent, and determine how tuition revenue is spent with the guidelines and parameters the board establishes," DeBauge said.

While tuition ownership would enable the universities to have more control, issues such as tuition rates still would be approved by the regents.

However, Rawson said the process still would be expedited, because under the system, the board would have final approval and the legislature would not need to enact any requests.

DeBauge said if it is enacted it would help the universities to be more efficient.

"We believe that it would allow the universities to concentrate funds where it is needed at any given time, and it would help meet the needs of the university better," she said.

Another issue discussed at the meetings was the proposed merger between Fort Hays State University and Pratt Community College.

The Commission for Higher Education Coordination heard final proposals from the two schools, and the implications of approving the proposal are statewide. If passed next month, the proposal will set a precedent in the manner in which the state deals with such mergers, regents said.

"It is important to understand that this has statewide implications as we discuss it in November," DeBauge said.

The board looks to discuss the issue further at the November meetings, when final action might take place. Regent Floris Jean Hampton said the merger is different than the one that merged K-State's main campus and the Salina campus about a decade ago, and it would set a precedent.

"Anything we do now, we know it sets a precedent, because it hasn't been done before," she said. "So we have to be astute in our planning, and give a pattern that someone could follow if they wanted to do that later.

"We have a lot of work to do on that proposal."

HORTON

"My roommate and I have actually became really good friends with the people down the hall," she said. "At first we didn't know many people, but we literally just started knocking on doors and introducing ourselves. You just have to get to know people, even if it is out of your norm to be that outgoing."

Sarah Hicks, resident assistant in Boyd Hall, said at the beginning of the semester she suggested residents introduce themselves to people.

"At first my suggestions were not put into action, but I emphasized that someone had to take the initiative," said Hicks, junior in pre-veterinary medicine. "I have noticed with Christie, and the other girls, they are starting to let down some of those barriers by keeping their doors open and feeling more comfortable about letting people just walk in. They really get along with each other and Christie is right in the middle with them. At first she was a little bit quiet, but now she knows a lot more people and is able to open up."

Horton said she noticed a change in the social atmosphere from high school.

"It is really different because you don't have the closeness with people that you did there," she said. "But, you do know tons more people, and they know people they introduce you to. It is just like a continuous circle and it is always a lot of fun."

Horton said one thing she did struggle with is when to say no to fun.

"It is hard to just say 'No, I can't go out tonight,'" she said. "My roommate will come home and give me the guilt trip if I don't want to go out. I have to learn to balance my time, because having fun sometimes gets in the way of studying."

The education part of college is one thing Horton said she has to conquer.

"It is a lot harder," she said. "I was one of those people who hardly ever had to study in high school and I still pulled off good grades. I am finding that doesn't work here. It is hard to get motivated to study, but I am learning I am just going to have to do it."

Horton said she hasn't declared a major yet, but is trying to decide because enrollment is coming up.

"I am leaning towards marketing or public relations right now, but I am not really sure," Horton said. "I do know that I want to minor in leadership, so I guess that is a step in the right direction."

Besides school and her social life, Horton said she is trying to balance her family life.

"It is hard when you go to college in the same town that your family lives in," she said. "I mean, don't get me wrong, I love having my parents so close, but it is hard because you want to be out on your own."

country, Greene has found education is the No. 1 issue on young people's minds. They also care about health care, racial profiling and abortion.

"They are very active in the causes they care about, but they just don't see that politics has an effect," Greene said.

The campaigns have tried to counter that by dispatching young family members to seek youth support.

George P. Bush — one of People Magazine's 100 most eligible bachelors — made the rounds for his Uncle George before hitting the books at the University of Texas Law School this fall.

The son of Florida Gov. Jeb Bush and his Mexican-born wife Columba, George P. often speaks of the Republican Party's inclusiveness. In recent days, he has re-emerged as a youthful face of the campaign, appearing in a new Spanish ad.

"Su nombre?" 24-year-old George P. asks. "Igual que mio, George Bush." (Translation: "His name? The same as mine, George Bush.")

Bush campaign spokesman Tucker Eskew said young voters want what Bush offers: personal retirement accounts, education reforms and an honest candidate.

SENATE

Senate proposals, and both sides said they were making progress toward compromise.

Administrators would like to see resources already on campus used to deal with some of the issues raised by senate, Reagan said.

Senate would like to see a clearing house created that would help direct students, faculty and staff to resources that could help them address their problems, Gray said.

For students, that could be the Women's Resource Center, the residence hall judicial board or a department head or dean, Reagan said.

Both sides said they would like to see opportunities for mediation.

"We want to address problems before they become legal issues," Gray said.

Coffman said he was dedicated to making mediation a more accessible option for faculty and staff.

Students' access to mediation has yet to be addressed but should be in this process, he said.

Because its content said was perceived as a conflict of interest, the task force report raised concerns about the affirmative action office's consultations with the university attorney's office.

Corporate attorneys investigate affirmative action complaints for most federal contractors, so Reagan said he did not see the relationship between the affirmative action office and university attorney's office as a conflict.

Another point the administration and Senate seem to disagree on is the obligation of the affirmative action office to follow-up on complaints.

Lafene debates moving to off-campus site

By SARAH BAHARI
Kansas State Collegian

Increased enrollment eventually could cause K-State's primary health provider to move to an off-campus location.

University officials have discussed the possibility of relocating Lafene Student Health Center to Mercy Health Center on Sunset Avenue within the next two or three years, Lannie Zweimiller, director of Lafene, said.

"We're maxed out right now — staff-wise and facility-wise," Zweimiller said. "If there's a large increase, 2- or 300, we would have to figure out how to accommodate them."

Because about two-thirds of the student body frequents Lafene on an annual basis, Zweimiller said they can assume the center would see that much of an increase in visitations, something the current facility most likely could not handle.

Planning for the relocation has not yet reached any formal stages, said Tom Rawson, vice president of administration and finance. Although casual discussions have been continuing for several months now, it remains only discussion at this point.

Rawson said he would like to move into the next stages sometime in the future and relocate within two years.

One of the most obvious benefits of moving would be to relieve some of the overcrowding at Lafene, Zweimiller said. It would improve the patient flow and give the staff more room to operate.

Lafene physician Robert Ecklund said they are not too crowded, but additional space would benefit staff and students.

"We could use more room, but we're not shoulder to shoulder," he said. "It would help us improve our already good service."

Lafene's staff has worked well with the space it does have, Ecklund said.

"We've emptied this storage room and moved into there, and we've emptied out this storage room and used it," he said. "We've utilized this space as efficiently as possible."

Emptying Lafene's building would also create space for the English department, Rawson said.

English classes are split into three separate buildings: Denison, Eisenhower and Leisure halls. With this change, the Department of English could relocate to Lafene's building.

"One of the main reasons for this is to consolidate the English department into a single location," Rawson said. "Enrollment does factor into this because we're having a shortage of classroom space."

Richard Allen, president and chief executive officer of Mercy Health Center Inc., said Mercy's Sunset location is undergoing $54 million renovations, slated to be completed in 2003. They plan to evaluate their needs before deciding what would be best for their space.

"We're in the process of determining long-term use and needs for the Sunset campus," he said. "When we complete this at the end of this year or beginning of next year, we'll work closely with the County Commission to see if our services our compatible to Lafene's services."

Mercy would still like to work with K-State and help them improve its health care, Allen said.

"Mercy Health Center is supportive of Kansas State University," he said. "We'll work for them if we can and try to help them meet some of their needs."

If Lafene does relocate to Mercy, Allen said more space, other than the current renovations, would probably not be necessary.

When these discussions begin developing into plans, students and the city of Manhattan will both be involved in the process, Rawson said. The Student Health Advisory Committee and the Riley County Commission both will play roles in the decision and moving.

Zweimiller said given the lack of parking at Lafene now, he does not foresee

Groups affected by center's move

By MAGGIE BLUNK
Kansas State Collegian

Although the alumni center is moving back to campus, many campus athletic clubs are wondering what the future has in store.

The KSU Alumni Association has operated off campus since 1991. Karen Schroeder, alumni center communications director, said the excitement was overwhelming when many alumni heard plans of moving the facility back on campus.

"What we miss is having interaction with students," Schroeder said. "It'll help us be more visible to students, and hopefully they'll remain in touch with K-State after graduation."

The center will be of use to public and campus organizations, but students such as Jill Shehi, junior in criminal justice and soccer club vice president, wonder where their teams will go if they can't practice at Memorial Stadium.

"We could practice at Anneberg Park, where we play, but they charge an arm and a leg," Shehi said. "We can't afford to practice there."

Shehi said the women's soccer club practices three to four times a week during the fall, usually having to share the field with the men's soccer club, rugby and lacrosse teams.

"We haven't heard what we will be forced to do, and the club hasn't talked about it, either," Shehi said.

Schroeder said the construction of the Alumni Center shouldn't affect the students at K-State during construction.

"Construction will just be on-site," she said. "And most big events will be held in the evenings."

She said the association might have to reserve parking in the west parking lot occasionally during the day, but all of the employees of the center will be able to park in the 50-55 spaces that will accompany the building.

The construction of the building probably won't interfere with the students' practice field, but to put the building between Memorial Stadium's track and Anderson Avenue, the track will have to be pushed back and widened, Mark Taussig, university landscape architect, said.

"It all started with the widening of Anderson," he said. "At the time, we didn't realize the Alumni Center was going into that space also."

Band director Frank Tracz said he didn't think the construction of the facility would affect the band in any way, but a possible relocation of practice areas would be difficult.

"Band is an actual academic class," he said. "A lot of the students don't have cars to drive if we would have to move off campus."

Tracz said he is in favor of redoing the stadium's track and field because he said the field doesn't drain properly, parts of the sprinkler system stick out of the ground and it is dangerous for anyone who plays or practices on it.

Derrick Borgmann, fifth-year senior in finance and a member of the rugby club, said he initially was concerned when he heard about the move.

"I was upset at first because they are going to take away our practice field," he said.

Since then, Borgmann has heard rumors that the Alumni

Illegal tobacco sales decrease in Kansas

By NANCY HULL
Kansas State Collegian

Statewide tobacco sales compliance has increased by 3.5 percent from last year's average, according to a report released last week by the division of Alcoholic Beverage Control.

From July 1 to Sept. 30, the rate jumped from 78 percent to 81.5 percent. During this time, ABC agents made 364 random attempts to purchase cigarettes and tobacco products in Kansas. Of these attempts, 67 licensees sold to underage buyers.

MICHAEL YOUNG/Collegian

No random attempts were made by ABC in Riley County during these first three months of the 2001 fiscal year. Riley County had a 71 percent compliance rate during the 2000 fiscal year.

Manhattan's Mini Mart convenience stores were last checked by ABC in the spring, Mini Mart owner Chuck Schimpf said. Mini Mart usually is checked by ABC three or four times a year, and the carding policy is an intensive part of training for new employees.

"Ever since ABC nailed half the town a couple years ago, we've been a lot more careful," Schimpf

States cut textbook taxes

By DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

Taxes on textbooks soon might be a thing of the past as states across the country are beginning to implement a new concept in their respective colleges and universities.

However, Kansas might be one state that's not on the brink of adapting the notion any time soon, said Jon Levin, general manager at Varney's Book Store.

"I think it would be a tough thing to pass in the state with the current budget shortfalls and the semi-drought we had, causing the price of crops to fall," he said. "It'd just be a tough thing to do at this time. There's a lot of pressure on the state for money right now, so I don't think they'd be very receptive to that idea."

Levin said he hasn't seen any efforts to pass a bill proposing tax-free textbooks in Kansas. To do so, however, a congressperson, either a senator or a member of the House of Representatives, would have to be willing to introduce such legislation to the state, Levin said, while getting as many sponsors as possible.

Missouri adopted the new policy of tax-free textbooks three or four years ago, Levin said, and to his knowledge, it's worked well in saving students a considerable amount of money.

Other states, such as Indiana, are also pushing strongly to pass such a bill. Students from the University of Indiana collected about 2,300 signatures, which they plan to present to a representative in the Legislature who might consider supporting the bill. That drive at IU is being combined with similar drives at other institutions across the state, namely Purdue, Ball State and Indiana State University.

When deciding whether tax-free textbooks will become a future reality at universities in Kansas, a question concerning revenue comes to the forefront, said Carrie Mitchell, assistant manager/book division manager at the K-State Union Bookstore.

"Taxes on textbooks pay for the education, so that could result in less money coming to the university," Mitchell said. "A lot of states are doing it. I just don't know how they replenished

Pentagon says U.S. military on alert in Gulf

By ROBERT BURNS
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — American forces in two small Persian Gulf states and in Turkey are on a heightened state of alert because of specific new indications of terrorist threats, the Pentagon said Tuesday.

"Given the circumstances, the recent attack on the Cole and the generally higher level of threat throughout that region, we thought it was simply the prudent thing to do, to go to that higher threat condition in those two specific areas," Pentagon spokesman Rear Adm. Craig Quigley said, referring to Qatar and Bahrain.

The threat condition in Bahrain and

Teen-ager holds students hostage in school raid

GLENDALE, Ariz. — An armed teen-ager briefly kept a classroom full of children and a teacher hostage Tuesday at his former elementary school before surrendering to authorities. No one was injured.

The former student at Pioneer Elementary School gave up after talking with members of a police SWAT team, police spokesman Matt Brown said. The standoff lasted about an hour.

"He came here with a purpose, but thank goodness he didn't carry it out," Brown said. Brown said the portable classroom was full when the student walked in with a 9mm handgun, but he gradually let students go. There still were several people in the room at the time the student surrendered.

It was not immediately known what prompted the situation.

Other students were bused to a high school, where parents could pick them up, and the school was closed.

Courtney Smith, who lives across the street from the school, said she saw the suspect enter the school grounds at about 11:15 a.m. He was wearing camouflage and had a hood over his head, but she didn't see a weapon.

"I didn't think anything of it. Next thing we know there were girls running out of the classroom, screaming. They told us there was a kid inside with a gun holding kids hostage," Smith said. "They were hysterical, crying and screaming. They told us he'd threatened to kill them."

Space shuttle Discovery lands after 3-day delay

EDWARDS AIR FORCE BASE, Calif. — Space shuttle Discovery and its seven astronauts streaked toward a landing in California's Mojave Desert on Tuesday after dangerously high wind prevented a touchdown in Florida for the third day in a row.

The shuttle was scheduled to touch down on the runway at Edwards Air Force Base in the afternoon after a 13-day flight during which the astronauts got the international space station ready for the arrival of its first full-time residents next week.

It was the 100th space shuttle flight for NASA and the first time in 4 1/2 years that a shuttle was detoured to California. The final flight plan had the shuttle zooming across the Pacific and right over Los Angeles, then northward into Edwards.

Gusts of close to 30 mph forced NASA to pass up a landing attempt at Cape Canaveral, Fla., earlier in the day. The wind also kept the shuttle from landing in Florida on Sunday and Monday, while rain clouds at Edwards on Monday scuttled landing plans there. To the astronauts' relief, the weather was ideal at Edwards on Tuesday.

During their flight, Commander Brian Duffy and his crew installed two new segments on the outside of the space station and also spruced up the inside for the three men who will be moving in for four months. They conducted four spacewalks on four consecutive days, an exceptional — and exhausting — amount of work.

The astronauts toiled constantly, from the time they rocketed into orbit on Oct. 11 until their departure from the space station on Friday. A broken antenna and a short circuit made their work even more difficult.

AT&T decides to divide company in coming years

NEW YORK — AT&T Corp., the nation's largest communications company, reportedly has approved a plan to split the company by spinning off its wireless and cable TV operations over the next one to two years.

The plan, which also calls for creation of a tracking stock for the company's consumer long-distance division, was approved late Monday by AT&T's board of directors, The New York Times reported Tuesday, citing people close to the company.

The remainder of AT&T would oversee its telephone network as well as the division serving business customers, the newspaper said.

Board members of AT&T were reportedly meeting Monday to consider a plan, tagged Project Grand Slam, to split the company into four free-standing businesses. Analysts who follow AT&T said Wednesday is almost certain to bring some major change.

If spun off, AT&T's cable operations would become the nation's biggest.

In 1984, the former telephone monopoly spun off its local calling operations as seven Baby Bells, several of which have since merged. In 1996, AT&T spun off its communications equipment arm as Lucent Technologies Inc. and its computer division as NCR Corp.

AT&T is one of the nation's most widely-purchased stocks after Metropolitan Life Insurance Co., Lucent and Avaya, an office phone system maker spun off by Lucent.

AT&T's market valuation has dropped by about $70 billion since January, partly because of falling prices in the long-distance industry.

Dr. Douglas Harper and Dr. Suelyn Hall make up a husband-and-wife medical team in Manhattan. Hall, a urologist, and Harper, an emergency physician, have busy lives but strive to find as much time for each other as possible.

DOCTORING MANHATTAN

Urologist, emergency physician work to find quality time together

By JAMIE BARRETT
Kansas State Collegian

Spending time with her husband and her two dogs is not something that is easy for Dr. Suelyn Hall. Her demanding job as a urologist keeps her under tight office hours, but her husband's busy schedule as an emergency physician also impedes on the couple's time together.

"Seeing each other is a challenge for Doug and I at times," Hall said. "When we do get together, we play golf."

Hall's husband, Dr. Douglas Harper, works as an emergency physician in Manhattan. Harper said the demands of their careers keep both himself and Hall on the go.

"She has a busy schedule of operating and office hours and I have 12 15-hour shifts I work at the emergency room every month," he said.

Hall graduated from the University of Miami in 1984 and went on to medical school in New York City. Harper graduated from the University of Rhode Island in 1985 and went on to New York, where he and Hall met.

Married since 1994, Harper moved to Manhattan four years ago to fulfill a military commitment at Fort Riley, and Hall followed a year later.

Hall joined the practices of Dr. Fred Freeman and Dr. John Divine when she came to Manhattan. She said she enjoys the contrast of Manhattan to her old home of New York City.

"My favorite thing is not having to spend an hour and a half going to work every day," Hall said. "Working here is much less stressful and the activity of things is a lot less here."

Harper said that since both he and Hall are doctors, they have to work hard to spend quality time together.

"We each have a couple of days off each week and try to spend as much time together on those days as we can," Harper said. "One thing that makes it easier is that we have no children to cut into our time together."

Hall said her schedule is normally laid out on a plan, with surgery being in the morning and office hours in the afternoon, but Harper has a much more random daily schedule in the emergency room.

"I was prepared for anything working in the emergency room in New York," Harper said. "Being trained in a large urban center you get a sense of anything. There is no one trained in that in this area so it is all invaluable."

Hall said that since she and Harper have moved from New York, they have been able to experience what Manhattan has to offer.

"We have had quite a bit of fun here," she said.

"I enjoy football so much more now that I did when I was in college, and that was when everyone could drink alcohol in college."

Hall said coming to work in Manhattan has helped her realize what her job is about and what she values about it.

"I see many female patients in my line of work," she said. "What I do for them really betters their quality of life in the end. Manhattan has a much better quality of life, and the emotional rewards I receive for helping them is invaluable."

Harper said being a doctor is not only a career that he shares with his wife, but it is something that has had a huge affect on him in the long run.

"Helping someone to live a longer and happier life is what being a doctor is," he said. "Nothing can touch that at the end of the day."

Committee examines Bramlage fee

By NANCY HULL
Kansas State Collegian

The current 43-cent per-student-per-semester privilege fee for the Bramlage Coliseum's rooftop repair and replacement was reviewed Tuesday by the Privilege Fee Committee.

A continuance for the next three fiscal years of the current $15,000 yearly privilege fee budget that has existed since July 1998 was requested by Charlie Thomas, director of Bramlage Coliseum.

If the committee gives Student Senate the power to enact the fee, Senate will vote on the fee Nov. 9. An approved budget would be effective in July.

The repair and replacement fee has benefited Bramlage's rooftop units in the past, and Thomas said the fee would continue to benefit the units.

"It's an energy-efficient building for the most part," Thomas said. "The fee has been a great help for the routine maintenance."

There have not been any electrical problems with the 15-year-old heating and cooling units, Thomas said.

When the Bramlage fee was reviewed in 1997, the $15,000 decision was a decrease from the previous budget.

Thomas said he and the committee did not feel Bramlage needed more than $15,000 a year.

"If we don't have the need, there's no need for the money to sit there when it can go somewhere else," he said.

Gayle Spencer, coordinator of student activities, said the reduction came during a time when the committee acted conservatively.

"That year, every fee either decreased or maintained the same," Spencer said.

Ryan Walker, Privilege Fee chair, said students should realize the fee benefits the attractions, athletics and entertainment that Bramlage makes possible.

"The fee supports a place that the community and K-State benefit from," Walker said.

Congress approves home-heating reserve

By JIM ABRAMS
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Congress on Tuesday gave final approval to the creation of a 2 million barrel home-heating oil reserve for the Northeast and belatedly restored the president's authority to tap the Strategic Petroleum Reserve.

The House voice vote on the energy bill came with the approach of a winter expected to bring soaring prices and dangerously low supplies of heating oil. The Senate passed the bill last week.

The legislation creates a permanent 2 million barrel heating oil reserve in the Northeast that the energy secretary can use when there is a significant regional supply shortage or price rise.

Last winter, despite mild temperatures, there was a sharp price spike in heating oil, and "this year we are on the verge of another crisis," said Rep. Edward Markey, D-Mass.

He said stocks of home-heating oil are down 70 percent from last winter and the costs of heating a home in the Northeast this year are expected to hit $900, up $140 from last winter.

The bill reauthorizes through the end of fiscal 2003 the Strategic Petroleum Reserve, the 600 million barrel stockpile in Texas and Louisiana set aside by law for energy emergencies.

The authority expired March 31, but President Clinton, citing the continued high oil prices and supply concerns, last month announced plans to draw 30 million barrels from the reserve.

That decision has become an issue in the presidential campaign, with Republicans charging that the drawdown would have little effect on oil supply and demand and was mainly a means to boost Vice President Al Gore's campaign.

Markey said the drawdown did contribute in bringing down world prices from about $38 to $32 a barrel.

Lafene should stay on campus for convenience

Lafene Health Center should not move off campus to Sunset Avenue.

This only would result in a big inconvenience for students and probably increase problems with student health care considerably.

However, there are reasons for change at Lafene, such as overcrowding due to increased K-State enrollment and lack of parking.

Yet portions of Lafene — for instance, the Women's Clinic, Sports Medicine and University Counseling Services — could move to Sunset Avenue, which would be another reason to help promote the transit system being debated.

But other things, such as the pharmacy and general health portions of the health center, should stay put or move to a similar location on campus.

The reason? Convenience.

Students are paying for convenience when they shell out their Lafene privilege fees.

This convenience allows students to pick up prescriptions in between classes and personally schedule appointments.

Lafene still needs to have a presence on campus. At the least, the center needs to have a pharmacy and a small staff of campus nurses available to assist students.

There are reasons why Lafene deserves to have an expansion, but there are some questions that still need to be answered.

Who will pay for the Lafene move? More importantly, will students be the ones paying for it by increased privilege fees?

Students deserve to have a convenient place to get health care on campus.

CAMPUS fourum 395-4444

The Collegian's Campus Fourum is an anonymous call-in system that allows readers to voice their opinions on topics relevant to the publication.

If Clint Mudrick were really a Kevin Smith fan, he would know that Silent Bob is Kevin Smith, so how could he be his running mate?

It's ridiculous for any group of people to consider themselves the best fans in the nation when they boo their own players.

Why do we need a student activity center again?

Hey, at least we still have basketball season, because when the Big Red machine rolls through here, things are going to get ugly.

Yeah, Kansas State needs a new student activity center like modern-day Germany needs another Third Reich.

Concerning having multiple polling places for the student activity center, why don't we have the zero-to-five-drink people go ahead and conduct another scientific poll about that?

If I was Bill Snyder, I would resign from Kansas State University. He will never please all of these fair-weathered fans.

Let's quit complaining and knocking the football team and just appreciate the fact that we still have a top-10 football team.

I didn't realize that 20 people wanting to vote for Ralph Nader on this campus constituted a fad. Apparently it does, according to Clint Mudrick.

If everyone writes in Elizabeth Dole for president, we still have a shot at having a decent president.

SHAKE

THINGS UP A LITTLE

BECKY WILSON/Collegian

Quick disclaimer: this column is my opinion, not those of K-State, the Collegian, or anyone else. It is not truth. If it were truth, a nearby shrub would be on fire. Use only as directed. Your mileage might vary. If symptoms persist, see a doctor.

As our editor intimated on this page on Monday, this page is all about perspectives and opinions, not gospel (not this semester). There are no articles on this page — simply columns. Articles are presentation of facts. Columns — at least good ones — lend their own viewpoints to their facts.

So what does a columnist do? The way I see it, a columnist writes to entertain, to inform, to persuade or to provoke thought and social change — or, optimally, lots of the above. Note: that's "provoke thought and social change," not "provoke asinine calls to Campus Fourum" or "annoy all Christians" or "anger all Democrats." It takes no skill to make people angry. A protruding nail in a floorboard can do that.

KEN WELLS

And, in my somewhat skewed perspective, I've tried to do things a little differently. I've tried to give you a different column than you read from me last week, the week before or even back in 1997. I've tried to lend my own voice to everything I write, even when I'm biting my lip and swallowing all my less-than-polite language. I've tried to give you something decent to escape into in the newspaper.

Sometimes I fail.

Last week I wrote a column on the assumption that it would be interpreted as something less than eloquent discourse on meat politics. I intended it to be diverting, entertaining, a distraction from Homecoming madness and the post-Oklahoma-game blues. I let several things slip into the column that I hoped would tip readers off to the column's inherent ridiculousness:

1. It was WRITTEN BY A STUFFED COW NAMED MILKSHAKE.

2. "Bovine-Americans." C'mon.

3. The "writer" who describes the murder of its brethren advocates consumption of squirrels, in a hypocritical ... OK, I'm sorry, I cannot do this. I cannot rationally pick this apart. It boggles my mind. I realize that, somewhere, somehow, a column written by someone named "Milkshake" might constitute eloquent discourse, but please, tell me we haven't slipped that far yet.

Much, if not all of the negative feedback we've received was from those directly involved in the cattle industry. I can understand their sensitivity, what with Oprah needlessly blowing a gasket over mad cow disease (ground I've covered already).

But if you're going to clash swords over issues, pick a more worthy target than little Milkshake.

The Milkshake column isn't constructed to be an argument. I apologize if the Collegian has conditioned readers to expect our best "well-fashioned, carefully constructed arguments" to hang together like cotton candy in a monsoon. (And I know you can hit me with examples of writing that Milkshake could tear his way through.) If I was going to argue meat politics, I guarantee you it'd be a little more coherent.

But I have less than no interest in the topic. It's as useful as debating religion — odds are your mind's made up, and if God himself told you to stop/start eating meat, we probably wouldn't listen.

Worse, I eat cows. I eat dead cows. I eat slow-walking cows. I'll carve off what I want and ride the rest home. I'm an omnivore. I wear cows. I have no moral high ground here. And talking about it for the last week has me burnt out like you wouldn't believe.

Maybe I assumed too much — that if you knew me better, you'd realize that the Milkshake column was as serious as the Chargers' playoff chances. And for that, I'm sorry. I thought it was obvious. But I'm more worried by the trend of tolerating other people's perspectives until they dare to clash with our own, at which point some feel free to threaten, accuse and intimidate. I don't want there to be sacred cows on this page.

If a vegetarian wants to present her arguments about the ethics of eating meat, I want her to feel free to express her perspectives.

And if we do disagree, let's not take it personally. Let's not nail him or her to a tree. And let's please keep a sense of humor about it all, OK? Sometimes a cigar is just a cigar, and sometimes a stuffed cow ... you get the idea. Right?

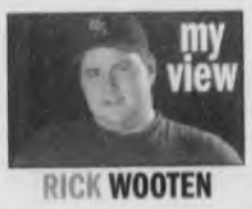
States should not allow convicted felons to retain voting privileges

The last day to register to vote in the upcoming election was Monday, and I hope that most of my fellow students were able to take advantage of this privilege.



I say privilege because if you are convicted of a felony, you lose the right to vote. While some people believe that voting is a right that should be guaranteed to all citizens, I believe the status quo is correct in stripping our most heinous of people the chance to choose our political leaders.

I discovered this controversy after visiting both the Web sites of the American Civil Liberties Union and the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

On Election Day, the people of Massachusetts will be able to vote on Measure Two, a ballot measure that would amend their state constitution to prohibit incarcerated felons from voting.

Massachusetts is one of only three states that still allows their housed felons full voting privileges. The ACLU warns that this would be a step backward in a state famous for preserving individual rights.

In some states, once you are convicted of a felony, you forfeit you right to vote for life. The NAACP lists this issue among its top 10 list of action issues on voting day. It claims that once people have been rehabilitated and have paid their debt to society, they should be able to regain all of the rights and privileges reserved for any other citizen.

RICK WOOTEN

There are several good reasons why the ACLU and the NAACP are wrong on this issue. First of all, convicted felons sitting in a prison cell probably would vote at a higher percentage than the general public who have jobs and other responsibilities.

If someone were to be convicted of a felony and were sitting in Lansing, Kan., on Nov. 7, they probably would vote. They would do this because it would break up the monotony of a day consumed with weightlifting and dropping the soap in the shower.

This leads to my second point. Do we as a society really want convicted felons, including murderers and rapists, to participate in the most important part of our democracy? They already have shown they can't be responsible with the most basic rights given to them by the Constitution and have withheld the rights of their fellow Americans. So why should we give them the right to choose the leaders who try to change the Constitution, and who appoint judges that interpret the Constitution?

Maybe we should ask the grieving families of Oklahoma City if they think Tim McVeigh should have the right to help choose our next president. If Dylan Klebold and Eric Harris had survived their own massacre and been convicted of their crimes, I wonder who they would have voted for in this year's school board election.

The fact is that we as a society not only should restrict voting by convicted felons during their time in captivity, but also after their release. Does anybody think that spending thousands of days cooped up in a cell and being sold for a carton of cigarettes should be counted as "rehabilitation"?

Just because an attempted murderer goes in to prison barely bench-pressing the bar and comes out with 24-inch biceps and a jump shot, does not mean that they are in any way more ready to carry out the responsibility of choosing our nation's leaders.

What if ex-cons decided they all wanted to move to Wamego? They could elect a mayor who would appoint a police chief that didn't bother investigating or arresting anyone for any number of crimes. Although this scenario might seem a bit far-fetched, it is one possibility of what could happen should the ACLU be successful in their ultimate goal.

Once again, the ACLU has shown us that they can attempt to carry out their well-intentioned objectives so far that they can actually be a threat to democracy.

We have seen the percentage of voters decrease during the last half of the 20th century, yet we should not let our democracy be influenced in this century by those who have rightfully lost the true spirit of good citizenship.

Speaker says creationism should be taught in religion class

EVAN SEMON/Collegian

Eugenie Scott, executive director for the National Center for Science Education based in El Cerrito, Calif., speaks on the subject "Why NOT Creationism in the Public Schools!" Tuesday night in Forum Hall.

By ALLISON RUSHTON
Kansas State Collegian

Creationism taught as religion in school is something that should be considered, according to Tuesday night's Lou Douglas lecturer.

In Eugenie C. Scott's lecture, titled "Why NOT discuss Creationism in the Public Schools!" she opened by stating that she is in favor of teaching creationism in school "as religion, not science."

Scott, the executive director of the National Center for Science Education, said she thinks much of the controversy surrounding evolution and creationism is due to the fact that many people view it as a dichotomous system: one either can believe in creationism and God, or one can accept evolution. Scott said this is not the case.

"With evolution, you are talking about what happened," Scott said. "You are not talking about whodunit."

Lindsey Schwartz, senior in social science, said she was impressed with Scott's presentation.

"She did an excellent job of explaining why it doesn't have to be a black-or-white issue."

Scott explained the various ways one can view creationism and evolution using what she called the "creation-evolution continuum." By placing creationism at one end and evolution at the other, she pointed out that there is a huge area in between them.

Scott divided the continuum into six basic categories, moving from people who favor creationism to people who favor evolution: flat-earthers, geocentrists, young-earth creationists, old-earth creationists, theistic evolutionists and materialists.

She offers this continuum as a tool for teachers who are instructing evolution. She said she thinks this will help bring an element of sensitivity to the controversial topic.

However, she was quick to point out that she does not think evolution and creationism should be taught side-by-side in a science course.

"To present evolution, and then to present a creationist view, if you are presenting it as a science, you are violating the First Amendment," Scott said.

Scott said that in a public school you cannot teach creationism as a fact of science.

"Schools have to be neutral toward religion," Scott said. "In a descriptive fashion, teach about the various forms of creationism, but in a non-science class."

Trevor Fast, senior in math and statistics, said he enjoyed the lecture.

"She was very knowledgeable on the topics, and she presented her argument well," Fast said. "She was obviously leaning against teaching creationism as a science, yet she advocated teaching the theory of it in a religious course, which I thought was very fair-minded of her."

Scott also pointed out that the controversy between creationism and evolution only occurs at the primary school levels.

"At the university level, evolution is taught, and there tends not to be a big controversy," she said. "It is taught matter-of-factly, even at schools like Baylor and Brigham Young."

Scott's presentation was the third in this year's Lou Douglas Lecture Series.

"All the speeches in this series concern human rights, social justice or public policy," Olivia Collins, lecture series coordinator, said.

Collins said because the Board of Education in Kansas opted not to require the testing of evolution on standardized tests, this was a hot topic.

Scott will be speaking on the legal aspects of evolution and creationism being taught in the schools at 8:15 tonight in Union 212.

After being swept by Baylor last season, the Cats are back to RETURN THE FAVOR

By MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

K-State's volleyball team already might have beaten Baylor once this season, but the players still haven't forgotten how the Bears swept them last season.

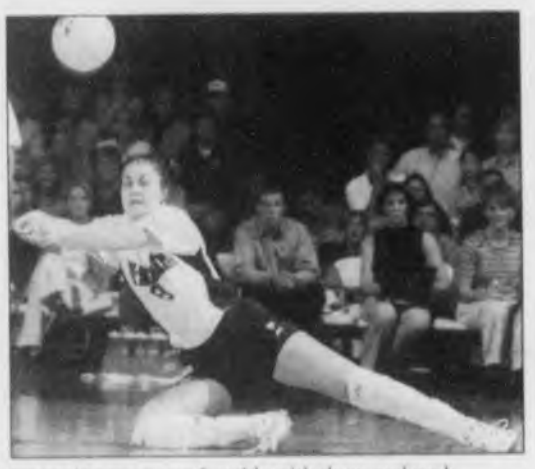
The Cats are trying to return the favor on the road tonight to stay near the top of the Big 12 title race, senior middle blocker Kelle Branting said.

"We don't like getting swept by anybody, and we really felt like we should have won both those games last year," she said. "Now that it's the second half of the Big 12, every game is a really big game for us, especially with three teams being tied for second place. We know we have to go in there with a killer attitude and finish them off."

The Cats also need a win to achieve head coach Jim McLaughlin's goal — become a great team by Nov. 1, and K-State is well on its way, Branting said.

"We're getting there. I think things are really starting to fall into place for us. With the exception of the Nebraska game, we're doing a good job of dictating the tempo of the game," she said.

One advantage for the Cats in working toward that goal is their steady progress throughout the season, Branting said.



"Slowly but surely is the way the season's been going. We're getting there. Last year we started out with a bang, and kind of fizzled out towards the end," she said, "but I think this year is a lot better since we didn't peak too early. We've definitely been building throughout the year."

The latest step in that building process was a victory over Iowa State on Saturday. While the Cyclones might not be a volleyball powerhouse, the win did help K-State, junior setter Disney Bronnenberg said.

"I think that game built our confidence a little bit," she said. "As a team as a whole, we may not have gotten into the long rallies and heavy side-out wars that we probably need going into teams like Baylor and Texas Tech. But I also think we played some good volleyball."

As a result of that play, the players are finally feeling more settled on the court, middle blocker Lauren Goehring said.

"I think our roles are becoming more defined. We're becoming more comfortable with them and each other," she said.

Goehring is one player who has been especially successful in fitting into a spot in the starting rotation. Just a freshman, she ranks fifth in the Big 12 in hitting percentage with 36.4 percent. In addition, Goehring has been able to keep opponents from focusing just on the outside, she said.

"I'm starting to learn where I'm supposed to go on all the hits. I'm getting up more in transition, so it opens up the outside," Goehring said.

Team skis, sets records in fall season

By DAN SMITH
Kansas State Collegian

Fun, perhaps, is the one word that best describes the K-State waterski club, freshman team member David Dlugosh said.

In an activity that many people do on local lakes during the summer months to beat the heat, he said it's hard not to have fun competing in events like slalom, trick and jump, and the Wildcat club offers enough pictures to prove it at www.ksuwaterski.homestead.com/page1.html.

But don't let all this talk about fun fool you. This club is serious about competition, junior captain Jeff Breuer said, and the members prove it on the water.

In the fall portion of the team's season, the squad finished second out of nine teams Sept. 22-24 at the Great Plains Conference tournament in Decatur, Ill., led by performances from Dlugosh and senior Lisa Leatherwood.

Leatherwood finished first overall in the women's division of the tournament, and Dlugosh took first in jump by establishing a Midwest collegiate record of 147 feet, smashing the old record by 10 feet.

"I kind of expected it," Dlugosh said of his dominance in the jump event, as he has participated in water skiing since he was just 5 years old.

In turn, Dlugosh has assumed a leadership role on the team, Breuer said.

"Our jump team is, by far, the best in the region," Breuer said.

After the conference tournament, the team stayed in Illinois and competed in the final tournament of the Fall, Regionals, which was in Dequoin, Ill., Sept. 28-Oct. 1.

Although the team finished seventh, Dlugosh again dominated the jump event, tying his own one-week-old record of 147 feet, helping the Cats to take the men's team jump title.

Meanwhile, Leatherwood finished fifth overall in women's skiing in her final appearance with the club before graduating this December.

Breuer said he expects an even better performance this spring, thanks in part to the team's finishes in the fall.

"We're probably one of the best teams in our conference," Breuer said. "We want to win our tournament next spring and place in the top two at regionals to get to nationals."

After a six-month break in the season, the Cats will hit the water again starting the second weekend in March, for one of the team's most fun events of all — the 3rd annual Hot Tub Classic at Manhattan's Tuttle Creek Reservoir.

"It's a lot of fun," Breuer said. "We rent hot tubs and take them out to Tuttle and invite everyone to come have a good time."

Thirty skiers attended last year's Classic, Breuer said, and it allows students who are interested in joining the team to check out the squad's equipment and find out what the the waterski club is all about.

Competition will resume April 28, when the club will be host to a tournament at Emporia's Super Lake.

Chiefs victory might indicate NU trouble

RICH SMITH

You know you're not sleeping enough when Gunther Cunningham becomes insightful to you.

The Kansas City Chiefs' skipper is a football coach's football coach. His personality is perfectly reflected in the "fullback rushes straight ahead, collides violently with other large men" plays he loves so well on offense — he's about as subtle and introspective as a punch in the mouth.

No, Cunningham is not someone you could picture, say, discussing philosophy with Nietzsche. So imagine my shock when, searching vainly for a column idea as I watched the Chiefs' 54-34 win on TV on Sunday, it was a sideline shot of Cunningham screaming (or perhaps grimacing — I don't remember) which filled me with a sudden, brilliant insight and clarity.

Here is the revelation Gunther Cunningham has brought me: No. 3 Oklahoma will upset No. 1 Nebraska this Saturday.

Still with me? I thought not. Well, I guess that's what the last 10 inches of this column are for. So just hang with me a sec — when inspiration strikes, you gotta go with it. Besides, at the very least it saves us all from another one of those moronic "random thoughts" columns.

You see, Cunningham did the unthinkable Sunday. He and his Chiefs beat the St. Louis Rams. For those of you who don't grasp football's finer points, this is a staggering, monumental undertaking — on a par with things like ending world hunger or reviving Richard Marx's singing career.

The Rams offense doesn't get outscored. Ever. They average more points per game than every team in the NFL, every college football team (save for K-State during preseason) and most of the NBA's Atlantic Division.

In that way, they are much like pro football's version of Oklahoma. Both teams feature the best quarterback in their sport, running similar (in philosophy, if not in every single X and O) multiple-formation, pass-heavy offenses. Both score approximately eleventy jillion points a game. And both were undefeated and thoroughly dominant coming into this week.

Conventional wisdom says that you beat an explosive, quick-strike offense such as OU's or St. Louis by controlling the ball on offense, chewing up clock, and limiting their chances to score. That's all fine and dandy, except it has no prayer of working.

St. Louis simply is too good, too lethally precise on offense, to be

Koehn earns additional accolades in preseason

K-State freshman Laurie Koehn was named the 2000 Preseason Big 12 Freshman of the Year by the league's head coaches, the conference office released Oct. 18.

Koehn, a 5-foot, 8-inch guard, is the first Wildcat to be named a preseason Big 12 Freshman of the Year.

The Hesston, Kan., native averaged 37 points, 5.9 rebounds, 3.4 assists and 5.2 steals per game as a senior at Moundridge (Kan.) High School.

Koehn also was named to the first team Women's Basketball News Service's Preseason College All-Freshman Team in late September and was honored as a top incoming college freshman in the Athlon Sports College Basketball preview edition.

Women's golf team 9th in preseason Big 12 poll

The Wildcats, under head coach Deb Patterson, were picked to finish ninth in the Big 12 Conference this season by the league's head coaches.

K-State received 47 points in the preseason poll, while Iowa State was tabbed to win the 2001 conference title after collecting five first-place votes and a 113-point total.

Meanwhile, Oklahoma was chosen second with 109 points and three first-place votes, and Texas Tech nabbed the third spot with 104 points and four first-place votes.

Last year, the Cyclones, Sooners and Red Raiders tied for the 2000 regular season title with 13-3 conference records.

The K-State women begin exhibition play Nov. 7, with the regular season tipping off at 7 p.m. Nov. 17 against UMKC.

9 Wildcats receive Big 12 honors for scholarship

Five men and four women on K-State's cross country squad were named to the 105-member 2000 Cross Country Academic All-Big 12 team released by the conference offices Tuesday.

On the men's side, senior Michael Beachler and sophomores Marin Boos and Dieter Myers were named to the first team, while Matt Davis and Istvan Nagy nabbed second-team honors.

Meanwhile, the women boast three first-team selections as well, including senior captain Annie Wetterhus, junior Amanda Crouse and sophomore Amy Mortimer. In addition, Julianne Kronoshek notched a spot of the second team.

To qualify for the academic team, student-athletes must maintain a 3.0 or higher grade point average, with first team selections earning at least a 3.2 in the classroom.

Bowl Championship Series 1st 2000 rankings announced Monday night during broadcast

Much-anticipated Bowl Championship Series rankings were released Monday night during the ABC Monday Night Football package.

The two national polling bureaus, the Associated Press and the USA Today Coaches polls, join eight computer services along with each team's strength of schedule in determining the BCS rankings, which happen weekly from Oct. 23 through Dec. 3, 2000.

In the final 1999 (Dec. 4) BCS ratings, the Big 12 Conference fared well, with Nebraska finishing third, K-State sixth, Texas A&M 14th and Texas 15th. Those four schools closed the season with a combined 40-11 record, including a composite mark of 23-2 by the Big 12 Champion Cornhuskers (12-1) and the North Division runnerup Wildcats (11-1).

Since the formation of the Bowl Coalition (1992-94), Bowl Alliance (1995-97) and BCS (1998-present), Big 12 schools have played in 17 of the upper echelon postseason contests and have won eight of these since 1992.

Carnahan's widow might take his Senate seat upon election victory

By SCOTT CHARTON
The Associated Press

JEFFERSON CITY, Mo. — Gov. Roger Wilson would ask Jean Carnahan, widow of Democratic Senate nominee Mel Carnahan, to be the U.S. Senate replacement should her late husband receive more votes than Republican Sen. John Ashcroft on Nov. 7, Wilson said Tuesday.

Carnahan met with Wilson Tuesday morning ahead of Wilson's announcement at the Capitol, which she did not attend.

"She indicated that was certainly not a decision she was ready to make at this time, and I respect that," Wilson said. Jerry Nachtigal, Wilson's spokesman, said Carnahan indicated that she would consider Wilson's offer.

But with two weeks before Election Day, Wilson suggested there was a sense of urgency in settling the issue.

"It's important that we do this today," Wilson said. "There's a responsibility in a democracy to let voters know what their choices are."

Roy Temple, executive director of the Missouri Democratic Party, said it was important for Wilson to make his intentions known.

"I think that gives voters a clear choice," he said, adding that Carnahan would carry on the values and vision of Governor Carnahan if she accepts an appointment.

A telephone call by the Associated Press to the Governor's Mansion was answered by a woman who said Carnahan would not be available for comment.

Carnahan has been attending public memorial and funeral services for her husband, her eldest son, Randy, and campaign adviser Chris Sifford, all killed in an Oct. 16 plane crash.

Top Democrats were urging Carnahan's appointment in the event her late husband receives more votes than Ashcroft, a Senate freshman and former two-term governor.

Officials have said it was legally too late to remove her husband's name from the ballot.

Carnahan has not publicly discussed whether she would be available as a surrogate for her husband if Mel Carnahan outpolls Ashcroft.

She heightened speculation while delivering a eulogy Sunday for Carnahan adviser Chris Sifford, urging mourners: "Don't let the fire go out."

If Carnahan receives more votes than Ashcroft, Wilson would appoint an interim senator after Ashcroft's term ends Jan. 3.

The appointee would serve until Missouri's next general election in November 2002.

During a St. Louis appearance Monday, Ashcroft declined comment about the campaign or about whom Wilson might appoint.

In an interview Monday, Wilson praised Carnahan for her "simply amazing" public composure and dignity since her husband's death, including leading the memorial procession behind his casket Friday during ceremonies that were broadcast statewide.

"It seems to me, with her display of grace under pressure, that Jean Carnahan can will herself to do whatever needs to be done to help people," said Wilson.

Other Democrats said Carnahan should lead the ticket to energize party workers still devastated about her husband's death.

"Everyone is waiting for Mrs. Carnahan to say yes or no. It's her call," said veteran state Sen. James Mathewson, D-Sedalia and a close ally of Wilson. "She is absolutely the first choice.

Powercat O' Lantern

Carving a Powercat into a pumpkin is one alternative to the traditional jack o' lantern. Step-by-step instructions to carving a Powercat o' lantern are below.

1. Choose a pumpkin that is comparable to the size of your design. The Powercat design may be reduced or enlarged on a photocopier to fit the pumpkin.

2. Cut the top or bottom from the pumpkin. If the top is cut, make sure the lid is large enough to cut a chimney above the candle flame. If the bottom is cut, make the hole large enough to clean the pumpkin, but not so large the pumpkin will not sit securely. A small chimney should also be added above the flame of the candle for a pumpkin with the bottom cut. Using hands and/or spoons, clean the seeds and guts from the inside of the pumpkin.

3. Take the design against the side of the pumpkin and use a toothpick or plastic carving tool to poke holes around the edges of all pieces to be cut out. This will help guide a path for carving the design.

4. Remove the design. Using a carving saw, cut the pieces out by connecting the dots created by the toothpick or plastic carving tool. Carefully remove the pieces and clean around the edges of the design.

5. Use a candle or glow stick to luminate the pumpkin.

Students around campus use techniques, time to celebrate fall holiday by designing pumpkins

Turnips carved to chase off evil spirits developed into the tradition of carving pumpkins to greet trick-or-treaters during Halloween.

Lindsey Tavlin, freshman in exercise and nutrition sciences, said carving pumpkins was something she enjoyed growing up. Even though she is a resident of Moore Hall, she said she wanted to keep the tradition alive.

"It's something I've done since I was little," Tavlin said. "I just like to get messy."

First using her hands, then a spoon, Tavlin said she is a perfectionist in making sure the inside of the pumpkin is clean. This year, Tavlin used a pattern that came with her carving tools to make a happy face.

"I figured usually all you can do without a design is the traditional triangle-eye face," she said. "It ended up being a lot easier than I expected it to be."

Residence hall rules keep Tavlin from being able to light the carving with a candle. She said she will probably substitute a glow stick to light the pumpkin on Halloween.

"At home we sprinkled cinnamon in the pumpkin before we lit the candle," Tavlin said. "This is the college adaptation, but I did get to get messy."

Ben Willt, senior in architectural engineering, said he has carved pumpkins already this year and plans on carving more this weekend with his friends. He said his favorite part of the experience is cleaning out the guts of the gourds.

"That's the fun part about it, the first time you stick your hand in there," Willt said. "It just goes back to when you were a kid and you want to stick your hand in something gross. There's no other way you can get that feeling."

For use as decorations for a West and Marlatt Hall dance, about 15 residents gathered to carve pumpkins Tuesday night in the lobby of West Hall.

Melissa Adams, junior in interior design, was one of the residence preparing the decorations.

"It's part of getting into the fun of Halloween," Adams said.

Adams said she has been carving pumpkins since she was younger. She said she cannot remember a year when she did not carve a pumpkin.

"You just have to do it to feel like you're celebrating the holiday," she said. "What's Halloween without carving a pumpkin?"

The residents carved a variety of designs, including Mickey Mouse, Powercats and traditional faces. Adams chose to use a design that she later adapted.

"I started to improvise a design," Adams said. "I wanted a happy pumpkin, not a scary one."

As a child, Adams said her mom let her create a carving without using a design. It was not until she was older that she started copying designs from books and other sources.

"When I was little, we didn't work with the design," she said. "I just liked the mess and the smell."

Powercat template

Use this page for a template to carve a Powercat on your pumpkin. Fold the page and tape the sides to the pumpkin.

Picking a pumpkin

Look for a pumpkin rich in color. Lighter colored pumpkins carve easily, but they don't last as long.

The size of pumpkin picked will depend on the size of design that will be carved into it.

Check the pumpkin to make sure there are no soft spots or worm holes.

Scrape off all of the mud to make sure there's no decay.

Wash the pumpkin with paper towels and water, removing all dirt and mud.

Source: www.learnfree-hobbies.com/designer pumpkins

Other tips

Use an ice cream scoop to clean out the pumpkin instead of a kitchen spoon.

Use a light coating of petroleum jelly on the cuts to help seal wounds, making the pumpkin last longer.

Place the pumpkin in a dark, cool place after carving to help increase pumpkin life.

Revive a shriveled pumpkin by placing it in a bucket of water.

searching for the perfect

DISGUISE

By KRISTEN DYMACEK
Kansas State Collegian

In a matter of minutes, you can go back in time to the 1970s, the Civil War era or even the 16th century. There also is the opportunity to be transformed into a witch, a deviled egg or even the Cat in the Hat.

With Halloween less than a week away, Pam Miller, owner of Marie's Costumes, said more people are searching for the perfect costume.

"Our biggest days will be Saturday, Sunday, Monday and Tuesday," Miller said. "The sooner people get in, the better. When they wait until the end, there's people bringing in costumes, picking up costumes, and it just gets to be a little crazy."

She said because costumes such as flappers, gangsters, clowns and characters from "Saturday Night Live" and "Star Wars" are popular, she has several people reserve costumes early.

"We've had people reserving since August," Miller said.

"The people that come every year know they had better get in here because the popular costumes go fast. The early people get the best selection."

Miller said that when people are looking for costumes, they have some options to choose from, including either buying or renting their costumes.

She said when people come in without a costume idea, she shows them photos of all of her costumes and helps them as they search several racks.

"Usually, we'll just pull stuff out for them to try. Once they start trying things on, they usually get a good idea of what they want," she said.

She said once the idea is formed, there is more to think about than just the costume.

"If they come up with something, we're trained to instantly come up with 1,500 ideas, like what looks good with what, what accessories are going to work," Miller said.

Items such as sunglasses, necklaces, makeup and other accessories can complete a costume, she said.

Kelly Jackson, sales associate for Halloween Bootique, said there are a range of prices for costumes depending on the style.

"They usually range between $20 and $40," Jackson said, "but there are some that are more expensive."

She said masks have a larger range pricing, between $10 and $70.

Melody Smith, co-owner of Grand Ol' Trunk, said a lot of people, especially the college-age crowd, come in looking for inexpensive costume ideas.

"They come in looking for crazy, goofy stuff," Smith said. "We get so many college kids because it's cheap and there's a variety to choose from."

Jackson said it's important to look around a little bit before buying a costume for Halloween.

"Go for something you're going to be comfortable with," she said. "Have fun with it, but don't be too crazy."

Man-eating plant part of Halloween festivities in Wamego

By JJ DUNCAN
Kansas State Collegian

A big green singing plant will be performing in Wamego this weekend, and he's out for blood.

"Little Shop of Horrors," a dark musical comedy about a man-eating plant, will be at 7:30 p.m. Friday and Saturday and 2 p.m. Sunday at the Columbian Theatre in Wamego.

The musical fits in well with the Halloween weekend, and the audience will enjoy the great music, Scott Kickhaefer, director of the play, said.

"It's a fun show that works thematically for the Halloween time slot," he said. "The music is really catchy because it was written by many of the same guys who wrote the music for things like 'Aladdin' and 'The Little Mermaid.'"

The musical, well-known for its movie counterpart starring Rick Moranis, is set in a struggling floral shop on the wrong side of the tracks. Seymour, played by Lee Lassiter, realizes that a strange plant he bought requires blood for food.

The musical takes the audience through Seymour's successes with the plant, his apprehension to feed it and his love affair with his co-worker, Audrey, played by Heidi Holle.

Since the movie has such an established reputation, it is difficult to be able to be individualistic with the musical while keeping audience members who are fans of the movie pleased, Kickhaefer said.

"Stylistically, the movie really captured the essence of the show," he said. "And while you have to show that you can follow the same conventions that others have set up, you also have to show that you can put your own spin on certain elements without ducking anything."

For those who enjoyed the movie, the production is worth seeing because the ending is different, but it is a strong show in itself due to the quality writing and high energy level, Lassiter said.

Lassiter, who said he usually enjoys darker shows, said the upbeat music and the clever writing style make it a funny show that is accessible to anyone.

"I think the play is well written," he said. "It also holds appeal with the dark edge to the humor. It's not pure slapstick; in fact, the characters say things that you are just a little surprised that they are saying sometimes."

Since many people have seen the movie version of "Little Shop of Horrors," it is difficult for an actor to take on a role that people already have decided on how it should be played, Holle said.

"Overcoming the stereotype of how Audrey should act is a challenge," she said. "While I borrow things from Ellen Green, I try not to do it exactly how it was done in the movie to keep it fresh every performance."

An obvious challenge of bringing the musical to life on the stage is bringing the plant, known as Audrey II, to life along with it. The play features multiple puppets of various sizes and controlled in different ways to make the plant seem real and grow throughout the musical.

The puppet for the first plant is only a hand puppet, but the final Audrey II requires a great deal of labor on the part of the puppeteer. At one point, Jessica Boatwright, the puppeteer for Audrey II, is completely inside the plant, moving its mouth with her arms.

Performing under the lights in an enclosed costume can be difficult, Boatwright said.

"The middle puppet, where I'm inside is the most fun because I get to move around and dance," she said. "But it gets really hot inside there sometimes."

said.

Mini Mart employees are trained to check the IDs of all people who look younger than 27, Schimpf said.

"If it's someone the employee isn't familiar with and doesn't know if they're over 18, they must check the ID," he said.

Placemats and signs displayed in stores, such as the popular "We Card" signs, help increase the compliance rate, Schimpf said.

"As consumers become more educated on the policy, it gets easier," he said.

Dara's Fast Lane stores have implemented their own checks on tobacco sales in addition to ABC checks, office manager Peggy Williams said. Williams said Dara's has secret shoppers that see if employees will sell to underage shoppers. Dara's employees are trained to card anyone who looks 30 or younger.

"If they sell to a minor, they don't have a job," Williams said.

She said employees have received $250 fines and a criminal record in addition to fines paid by the store.

"Clerks get harassment from a lot of college students who don't want to show IDs, and that makes it hard on employees," she said. "Our employees sign an agreement not to sell to underage customers."

Employees also keep in mind they are liable if they're aware a customer is giving tobacco to minors, Williams said.

She said Dara's had to quit selling to a customer who was distributing cigarettes at high schools.

Williams said Dara's stores have been checked over a dozen times within the last three years by ABC and have been caught selling to underage customers twice.

Scott Holeman, communications director for the state department of revenue, said although the compliance rate is improving, there still are trouble spots in the state. Since the 1997 fiscal year, the rate has moved from 35 percent to its current 81.5 percent.

"Any non-compliance is a problem," Holeman said. "We're pleased with the increase, but there's still work to be done until there's 100 percent compliance."

FORCES

Qatar was raised to Delta, the highest possible level, this past weekend, he said.

Quigley said the threat condition for U.S. forces at Incirlik Air Base in southern Turkey was elevated more than a week ago to "Charlie" level, the second-highest threat condition. Incirlik is the hub for American and British warplanes enforcing a no fly zone over northern Iraq.

Quigley said the decision to raise alert levels was based on intelligence reports of multiple threats from multiple sources. He said the threats were specific, but the credibility of the sources was unknown.

The U.S. military employs four levels of security alert above threat condition normal. They are Alpha, Bravo, Charlie and Delta.

There are about 1,100 U.S. military personnel in Bahrain, base of one of the most important American military contingents in the Gulf: the Navy's 5th Fleet. The Navy also has a carrier battle group in the Gulf. A three-ship Amphibious Ready Group carrying 2,100 Marines that normally is in the Gulf is now in Aden, Yemen, to assist with the crippled USS Cole.

There are fewer than 50 U.S. troops in Qatar, who manage a large stock of prepositioned Army war-fighting equipment.

U.S. troops in Saudi Arabia and Kuwait were not included in the heightened state of alert, Quigley said.

He described the moves in Bahrain and Qatar as a cautious course of action in view of the bombing of the Cole on Oct. 12 in Aden. The more than 200 U.S. military personnel in Aden, — including 101 members of Marine Corps anti-terrorism squads, have been at a Delta threat condition since the bombing, he said.

stopped. Maybe slowed a bit, but contained? No chance. Unless lightning strikes all 11 starters and several key reserves, or God himself intervenes, they're going to hang 30 points on you, guaranteed.

This is where Cunningham enters the picture. The undefeated Rams finally fell because he figured out something that's eluded NFL coaches for the last two seasons: if you want to beat the Rams, you have to do it at their own game.

The Chiefs scrapped their traditional ball-control offense in favor of a no-holds-barred, pass-on-every-down approach, and it worked to perfection.

This is where we revolve back to this weekend's Nebraska/OU matchup. No one has even come close to stopping the Sooner offense this season, and Nebraska won't be the first.

The Huskers are 33rd in the nation in pass defense and feature a young secondary, while OU is fourth in pass offense and hitting on all cylinders, having shredded talented defenses for 649 aerial yards in its last two outings.

That means that if Nebraska hopes to win in Norman, Okla., on Saturday, Husker QB Eric Crouch will have to win a shootout with OU's Josh Heupel.

Not bloody likely. Crouch is an outstanding running quarterback, but as a passer he's ... well, he' s an outstanding runner. And he'll get his rushing yards from the Sooners, but OU's defense is good enough to contain him.

Add home-field advantage and an extra off week for preparation to Oklahoma's side of the ledger, and I see them as the clear favorites.

So call your bookie if you wish, my friends. I'll make you rich before the semester is out if it kills me.

But if Oklahoma wins, be sure to send the thank you note to Gunther Cunningham, not me. Maybe it'll take that grimace off his face. Nah, probably not.

After seeing limited action during most of the month of October, Jensen started for the injured Jenny Pollard and hit 10 kills against the Cyclones.

"I think Cari Jensen has gotten back into the swing of things. I know a lot of people have been talking about her being in a slump, but I don't think that was necessarily true," Bronnenberg said. "I think she just had some things to figure out, and I think she did just that."

If the Cats are to continue this progressive trend, they will have to overcome a pesky Baylor team on the road first. The Bears dig the ball well, forcing long rallies and trying an opposing team's patience. The Cats will just have to play the same way, Goehring said.

"We just have to come back with a lot of good digs, too, so we can keep swinging and eventually get that kill," she said.

Playing on the road also doesn't faze the Cats, especially the older players, Branting said.

"Being a senior, this will be the eighth time I've played Baylor and the fourth time I've played them down there. They're not new arenas to me anymore," she said. "So I don't feel like I have to prepare myself as much for the intangibles, because I've been to the gyms and I know what they're like."

CENTER

Center will have rooms that clubs and organizations can use. He said he heard one room would have large windows for gameday crowds.

"If they make the changes I have heard about, I have a good opinion about that," Borgmann said.

Borgmann said the rugby team practices at 5:30 p.m. Tuesday through Thursday. He said it would be a tremendous facility for future generations of K-State rugby players.

He also said if the track is widened and pushed back for the alumni center, the rugby team would be able to play in the new space.

Another club that is uncertain of their future is the rock climbing club.

Mike Barnthouse, senior in mechanical engineering and rock climbing club president, said he hadn't heard if his team will be able to continue to climb.

"Word is that we'll be booted out, but they are going to need a good reason if they won't let us climb," he said.

Barnthouse said the new center probably would affect the rugby, soccer and lacrosse clubs more than it would his club.

Taussig said plans for Memorial Stadium eventually would affect all clubs using the stadium area. K-State is planning to rubberize the Memorial track, renovate the field by putting in new turf and an irrigation system and possibly fencing off the north side, he said.

"The track will be more egg-shaped," Taussig said. "But it's a recreational track. It's not for competition."

Taussig said a temporary track will be installed when construction begins on the Alumni Center. He said the stadium's field was designed for football, but after widening it to 220 feet, it will allow the soccer and rugby teams to play on it.

"Before the Alumni Center is done, we'll start redoing the track," Taussig said. "We hope to begin renovation in summer 2002, and the track and field will probably be able to be used in 2003."

Taussig said the university has looked into where the club sports will practice, but nothing has been determined.

"The field's primary use will be a game field," he said. "Not a practice field."

Changes for the corner of Anderson and Denison Avenues will begin next spring or summer.

"I'm used to the space being filled with students, but the Alumni Center will contribute meeting room space," Taussig said.

"I'm sure the pluses outweigh the costs."

LAFENE

student responses being negative.

"From what we have gathered, students would not see it as a huge inconvenience," he said. "We would be more accessible to vehicle traffic. We wouldn't be as accessible to pedestrian traffic."

Carlene Nickel, junior in open-option, said she disagreed. Although it wouldn't affect everyone the same way, it would inconvenience many people.

"Not everybody has a car or way to get there," she said. "It's handier for most people to be on campus. They can just stop in between classes."

More parking would be worth it to Jenny Miller, junior in business.

"It would be more convenient," she said. "More parking. It'd probably also be easier to go there for emergency services."

While students differ on the effect Lafene's relocating would have, Rawson said that when the time comes, they will be given a chance to give their opinions.

Another issue that will be looked at more closely is money, Zweimiller said. As of now, discussions have not included raising student privilege fees to fund the new space.

"An increase in fees is not being considered," he said. "We're looking at doing it right now without any increase."

Expanding somewhere on campus has not been looked at, Rawson said. He said he does not see that as a strong possibility.

"There have been no discussions of expanding on campus," he said. "I don't know where you would do it. We're pretty landlocked right now."

As long as it is what students want, the move is inevitable, Ecklund said.

"It will happen," he said. "It will take time, though. From what I understand, everybody wants it to happen.

"We're here to help the students, and whatever is best for them is what's best for the clinic."

TAX

the revenue."

Such a question would be up to legislation to decide, said Sue Peterson, assistant to the president and director of governmental relations. That decision likely could result in legislators wishing to increase tuition at large colleges and universities to compensate for the lost revenue.

"Any time a tax cut is made, it's an expenditure for the state," she said. "So it's kind of a complex trade-off system. It impacts the state, county and city."

Regardless of revenue issues, the adoption of tax-free textbooks statewide would give bookstores better competition with textbook sales over the Internet, Mitchell said.

"It would put us on a level playing field with the Internet sales. You don't have to pay taxes on that," she said.

In addition, tax-free textbooks would be good for Kansas students as well, Peterson said.

"Regarding the overall cost, it would be a benefit to the students. You and I both know textbooks are expensive items," she said.

Taxes aren't the only added expense to textbooks, though, as late book order submissions by professors are hurting students' pocketbooks in the long run.

According to a study by the Pertusati University Bookstore, those late submissions are costing University of Southern California students about $175,000 more this semester on textbooks.

If more professors met the fall deadline for title submissions, students could resell more of their spring course books to the bookstore, receiving up to half of each book's market price. Instead, the bookstore bought back the books at a much lower value.

Additionally, receiving late books lists also prevents bookstore officials from requesting books from vendors, Levin said, forcing them to acquire new copies from the publisher for student purchase.

At USC, the Pertusati University Bookstore found that this cost students about $82,000 more when buying new books as opposed to used ones.

In the end, even though Mitchell said tax-free textbooks aren't feasible for the state revenue right now, she said it's something to keep in mind down the road.

"I'd definitely be in favor of looking into it," Mitchell said.

GREEK letter

LETTER OF INTRODUCTION

The Greek Letter was established as an informative advertisement for members of the Greek community, as well as those who are interested, to learn more about Greek life. This will be monthly segment featuring 'Greek of the Month', a calendar of upcoming events occurring in the Greek Community, and highlights of Greek news. Our intention is better inform the K-State student body about what Greek life is and to show our appreciation to Greek members who are making a difference. If you have any questions or comments, please feel free to contact us.

GREEK AMBASSADORS

Recently, six men and women were added to the team at Greek Affairs. The application process was held to obtain a group of Greek leaders to help at recruitment events and to make presentations at Senior Days held at K-State. These new ambassadors will be responsible for explaining the leadership, scholarship, and social opportunities offered by becoming a member of a fraternity or sorority. The purpose of these new positions is to effectively communicate the positive aspects of Greek life to high school seniors, as well as to anyone who is a current student at Kansas State.

We congratulate the men and women who were selected as 2000-2001 Greek Ambassadors:

Katie Ashton	Alpha Chi Omega
Amy Johnson	Alpha Delta Pi
Julie Kircher	Alpha Xi Delta
Jason Ross	Delta Upsilon
Scott Kice	Lambda Chi Alpha
Mark Vanderweide	Sigma Phi Epsilon

TOP TEN FACTS ABOUT K-STATE'S GREEK LIFE

10. A U.S. Office of Education report shows less than 2% of the average college student's expenses go to chapter dues.
9. 80% of K-State's chapters have received national awards of excellence, and over half have been named number one in the country.
8. Greeks comprise 20% of the undergraduate student population, yet they hold nearly 65% of the leadership positions on campus.
7. K-State was one of the first campuses to develop an anti-hazing policy (1957) and a substance abuse policy (1990).
6. The Panhellenic and Interfraternity Councils have consistently been recognized for overall excellence. In the past ten years, each council has received the top award in their respective category at the Mid-American Greek Council Association conference.
5. Some Greek activities that fraternity and sorority members are involved in:
   - Interfraternity and Panhellenic Councils
   - Order of Omega, the Greek honor society
   - GAMMA, Greeks Advocating the Mature Management of Alcohol
   - All-Greek philanthropies
4. Last year at K-State, sororities and fraternities donated more than $57,000 and spent more than 9500 hours serving the campus and community.
3. Every sorority chapter has computer facilities, scholarship programs, and personal development workshops.
2. For over 20 years, the all-Greek GPA has been above the all-university GPA.
1. Sororities and fraternities offer more than just housing; they offer leadership, scholarship, and lifelong friendships.

GREEK OF THE MONTH

Michelle Hiss
Year: Junior
Chapter: Delta Delta Delta

Michelle was chosen as Greek of the Month because of her outstanding achievements within her chapter, as well as her extracurricular activities. Michelle planned the first Delta Social, which helped to strengthen Kansas State University's overall Greek unity. This was an event that invited all fraternity and sorority chapters containing the Greek letter "delta" to participate in an alcohol free social event. Michelle also developed a new member recognition program, which included writing news releases to each new member's local newspaper and facilitating presentations to familiarize the new members with Tri-Delta.

As well as chapter events, Michelle is active in Greeks Advocating Mature Management of Alcohol (G.A.M.M.A.), the Marketing Club, volunteering at the Manhattan Emergency Shelter, and she is employed at Salon Essentials. Thank you, Michelle, for being a contributing member to the Greek community!

Limited visibility leads to return of stop sign

■ Sign near Union parking lot reinstalled at request of police.

By NANCY FOSTER
Kansas State Collegian

When Mid Campus Drive was made a one-way street Aug. 11, the stop sign located near the K-State Student Union's east entrance was eliminated. Tuesday, less than three months later, the stop sign was put back up.

"People were having a really hard time seeing the cars driving down Mid Campus Drive, because of the cars parked there," said Mark Taussig, of associate facility planning facilities.

Taussig said there was a concern because of the visibility, and also because of the crosswalk.

"It's a pretty busy crosswalk right there," he said. "With the crosswalk and the sight lines, it seemed to be the easiest thing to do right now."

Taussig said a flashing light will accompany the sign to help make people aware that it's there.

He said the stop sign was taken down in the beginning of the year with the idea it would help — not hinder — traffic.

"When we changed it to one way, we felt like we didn't need it anymore. We thought it might allow traffic to flow through smoother," Taussig said. "In retrospect, we decided it was best to have it up."

He said the K-State Police made the recommendation that the sign be put back up.

"There have been some close calls," said Lt. Richard Herrman, patrol commander with the K-State Police. "Some concern has been expressed."

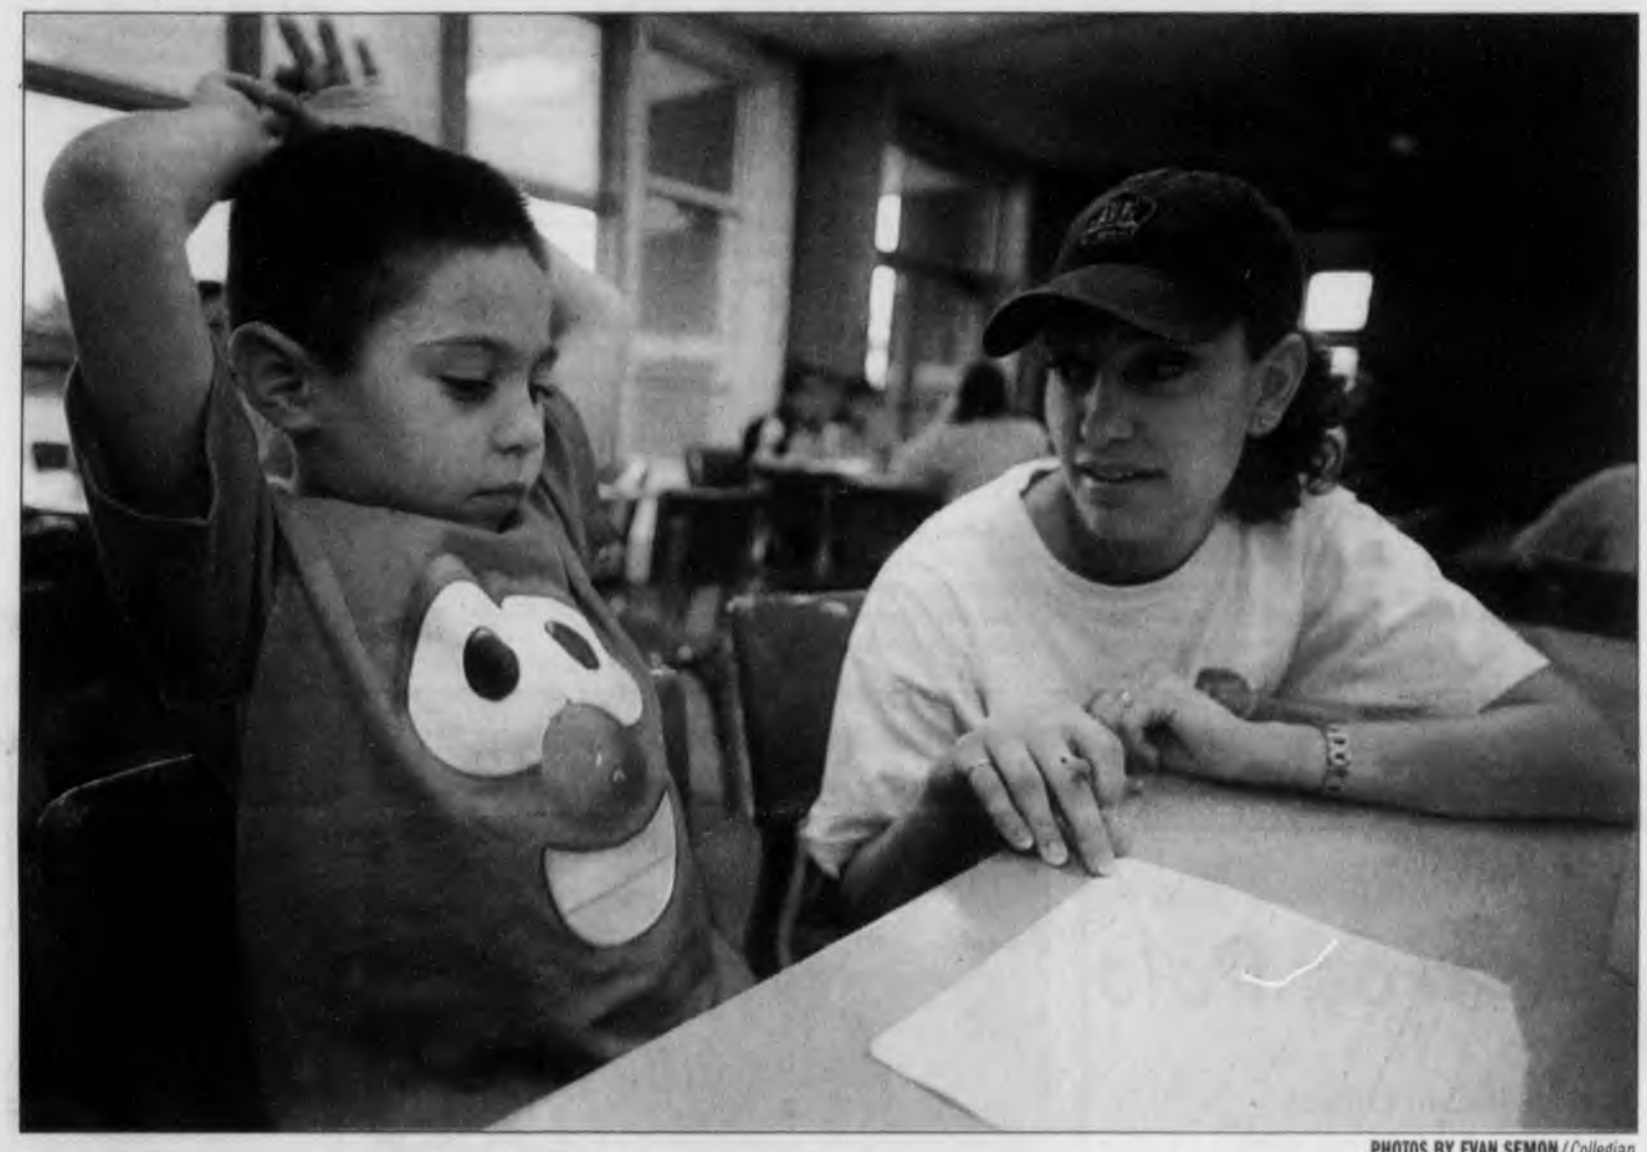
He said he didn't know if any accidents had occurred due to not having the stop sign there, but that without a stop sign, it was a hazardous area.

"There were a lot of close calls," Taussig said.

He said facilities would eventually like to change the way the cars are parked on Mid Campus Drive.

"Eventually, we want to put the parked cars on the other side of the street, and a bike lane all the way down to Anderson Avenue," Taussig said.

There are no plans for the change, however. Taussig said the current plan is to just monitor the street for now, and possibly make changes next summer.



"There are a lot of bicycles that go down that way, and they hit the end of the bike lane and have nowhere to go. So, they go on the sidewalk, which isn't the best," Taussig said. "So, it's something we're looking at."

Other than concern regarding the removal of the stop sign, Taussig said the road change from a two-way to a one-way has created positive outcomes.

"It's worked out well. It took a while to adjust to it, but we are seeing a reduction in traffic through some of those areas," he said. "So, that's an improvement."

Timothy Fouquet, 5, attends a tutoring program designed for children who live in the Jardine Terrace Apartments. Volunteers like Kaylene Kramp, senior in physiology, help children such as Fouquet by tutoring from 5 to 8 p.m. on Mondays and Wednesdays at the Thomas J. Frith Community Center.

For Timothy Fouquet, 5, it is all about getting to play Go Fish.

"After I am done with my learning, I get to play cards," Timothy said. "My favorite game is Go Fish, but I have to do my writing before I can play it."

Timothy attends a tutoring program, led by his mother, Monica Fouquet, designed for children who live in the Jardine Terrace Apartments. Tutoring is available from 5 to 8 p.m. Mondays and Wednesdays at the Thomas J. Frith Community Center.

"The idea is to provide a service to the families of Jardine," said Fouquet, coordinator of tutoring program and graduate student in speech pathology. "I have a child myself, and I know that it is important to have that one-on-one interaction; however, I also realize the schedules get hectic and parents, myself included, may not have enough time. The program allows the children to get help on homework or in other areas of school with one-on-one attention."

Fouquet said both children and the parents respond to the program positively.

Official resigns after Cole bombing

By ROBERT BURNS
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C.— A Pentagon intelligence expert on terrorism in the Persian Gulf has told Congress that he warned of possible terrorist attacks on U.S. forces there before the bombing of the USS Cole, but higher-ups failed to pass the information to military commanders, senators said Wednesday.

The intelligence official, whose name was not disclosed, resigned in protest the day after the Cole attack Oct. 12, Sen. Pat Roberts, R-Kan., said at a Senate Armed Services Committee hearing.

Roberts said the resignation letter was given Monday to the Senate Intelligence Committee. Although it is not classified, the Armed Services Committee said it would not make it public.

Armed Services Committee Chairman John Warner, R-Va., said the allegations would be discussed in detail during a closed-door committee hearing with several Pentagon officials, including Vice Adm. Thomas Wilson, director of the Defense Intelligence Agency, for whom the official worked.

What he felt is that his assessment was not given that proper level of consideration by his superiors and, as such, was not incorporated in the final intelligence reports given to military commanders in the Gulf, Warner told reporters after the hearing.

Pentagon spokesman Capt. Timothy Taylor confirmed in a later interview that a mid-level DIA counter terrorism expert resigned the day after the Cole attack, but he would provide no other information about the individual or his analysis.

Roberts said the resignation letter refers to an intelligence assessment in June that apparently predicted a terrorist attack in the Gulf.

"He indicates his analysis could have played a critical role in DIA's ability to predict and warn of a potential terrorist attack against U.S. interests, and goes further to say he is very troubled by the many indicators contained in the analysis that suggest two or three other significant acts

Research reactor cited for violations

■ University of Missouri warned, not fined for breaking 2 low-level government safety regulations.

The Associated Press

COLUMBIA, Mo. — The Nuclear Regulatory Commission cited the University of Missouri Research Reactor — but did not fine it — for safety violations.

A letter was sent to reactor director Ed Deutsch early this month, citing the reactor for two violations of federal safety regulations. They were at the lowest level on the commission's severity scale and no fines were issued.

Commission spokesman Jan Strasma said that's because no one was hurt and the potential for endangering anyone during the incidents was low. He said future reactor inspections will focus on the areas found in violation.

Deutsch said he was pleased with the findings because the reactor faced three violations with possible fines of up to $16,500.

"They gave us what we considered the best possible outcome," Deutsch said Wednesday.

Jack Burns, vice provost for research, said he believes the reactor staff already made significant progress in preventing future incidents, and that helped persuade the commission not to fine the university.

"(We) recognize that mistakes were made, and we reacted quickly to those mistakes," Burns said.

The violations were issued in response to incidents April 12 and June 12.

In April, employees allowed the release of 10 units of radiation over three minutes. The NRC allows no more than five units of exposure during a year to a reactor worker. No workers were in the area at the time of that incident.

K-State's reactor serves as research, educational tool

By ANGIE JOHNSON
Kansas State Collegian

K-State's TRIGA Mark II Nuclear Reactor on campus serves more purposes than expected.

The large machinery near Ward Hall may seem dangerous to some, but it performs tasks that many nuclear reactors cannot.

"It is a unique educational and research facility that has proven to be helpful to students and faculty," said Kenneth Shultis, professor of mechanical and nuclear engineering.

The reactor was built in 1962 and was purchased through an atomic energy commission grant. Funded with only $250,000, it now

2 Kansas City workers become ill from chemical

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Emergency vehicles surrounded an office building near Union Station late Wednesday afternoon, when two workers reported they became nauseous after opening envelopes containing an unknown substance.

The incident took place in the Blue Cross-Blue Shield building, in the Crown Center area of the city.

It wasn't immediately clear whether the two worked for Blue Cross-Blue Shield or another company in the building.

Brad Humston, spokesman for the Kansas City Fire Department, said about 100 people were working on the floor at that time, but only two women were in the immediate area.

The building was closed but not evacuated.

He said the two reported they experienced nausea, but said officials had not determined what the substance might be.

Humston said the two were given a soap and water decontamination and were taken to a hospital.

Kansas City Police Capt. Rick McLaughlin said the package was being turned over to the FBI, but he didn't know when its contents might be determined.

"We don't know what they had in there," he said. "Initial reports didn't indicate, if there was anything in the envelope."

Hazardous material units from Lee's Summit, Mo., and Johnson County, Kan., were among those at the scene.

Don Pickard, a spokesman for the Metropolitan Ambulance Services Transit, said the two women followed proper procedures in dealing with the substance.

"What we are seeing is training paying off," he said. "They opened it, became nauseated and left it where it was."

Russian plane crashes, kills all 75 passengers

TBILISI, Georgia — A Russian Defense Ministry plane slammed into a mountain while trying to land in bad weather Wednesday evening in Georgia. Officials said all 75 people on board were feared dead.

A search and rescue team sent to the crash site, about 15 miles east of the city of Batumi, found pieces of the plane and scorched earth, Georgia's Emergency Situations Department said. Russia's RTR television reported that bodies had been found, and showed footage of flaming pieces of wreckage lit by rescue workers' floodlights.

The cause of the crash was not immediately known.

The plane veered off course on approach in difficult weather conditions, said Alexander Silagadze, head of the civil aviation agency Sakaeronavigatsiya.

Russian military officials said the plane, an Il-18 transport with 64 passengers and a crew of 11, was at an altitude of 5,300 feet near Mount Tirava when communications with it were lost, the Interfax news agency reported. Both military and civilian personnel were aboard, Interfax said.

Interfax said passengers aboard the plane included servicemen and their wives and children returning from vacation. Although Russia and Georgia became independent countries when the Soviet Union broke up in 1991, Russia still maintains troops in Georgia.

A spokesman for the Georgian emergency department said on condition of anonymity that it was unlikely anyone survived.

Divers retrieve bodies of sunken Russian sub

MURMANSK, Russia — Deep-sea divers entered the hull of the sunken nuclear submarine Kursk on Wednesday and found the bodies of three of the 118 victims, a Russian navy official said.

The bodies were found several hours after a team of Norwegian and Russian divers succeeded in cutting the first hole in the thick hull of the submarine on the bottom of the Barents Sea, Northern Fleet Chief of Staff Mikhail Motsak said on state-run RTR television.

The bodies were removed from the hull in preparation for bringing them to the surface, Motsak said.

It took a team of divers five days to cut one hole through the Kursk's thick steel double hull, 356 feet below the surface in the cold waters of the Barents Sea. Divers used a stream of pressurized water mixed with diamond dust to slice through a 2 1/2-inch-thick steel plate.

The divers also smoothed the jagged edge of the 3-foot-wide hole with a special cushion for safe entrance into the wreck, he said.

Only Russian divers entered the Kursk. Their foreign colleagues were to assist from inside a diving bell lowered to the Kursk from the divers' mother ship, the Regalia.

The divers hope to pull bodies or body parts out into the ocean, then bring them to the surface to return to their families for burial.

Russian naval officials said they only hope to recover about one-third of the 118 seamen's bodies, the rest likely destroyed by the powerful explosions that ripped through the submarine on Aug. 12. The cause of the accident has not been officially established.

MAC truck brings art, music, culture to children

By SARAH BAHARI
Kansas State Collegian

When the brightly-colored MAC truck pulls into the lot of the Manhattan Daycare and Learning Center, Adene Winter knows the kids will be captivated for the next hour.

Winter, executive director of the daycare, said she is grateful for the efforts of the Manhattan Arts Center to integrate art into the lives of children.

"It supports the children in another experience — an art experience," she said. "It's helpful because children can see there's more art in the world than just what's usually in the classroom."

The MAC truck travels to nine preschools and 17 after-school programs each month bringing a different art project each time, said Tish Rogers, director of the Manhattan Arts Center.

Art supplies can be expensive, she said, so the center provides this program to schools free of charge. It also helps get the kids interested in it at a young age.

"We have to design projects so they can succeed," Rogers said. "Success with art at this age is very important."

The arts center continues bringing art, music and culture into the school setting despite the constant financing struggle it faces, Rogers said. The MAC truck program alone costs between $30,000-$35,000 a year.

Kansas ranks 45th out of 50 states in how it funds art, which is calculated by the dollar amount the state allots to the Kansas Arts Commission per person, Rogers said. The commission receives less than $2 million annually from the state.

The lack of state funding hurts communities like Manhattan, Rogers said, by not giving people the opportunity to experience the positive effects of art.

MICHAEL YOUNG/Collegian

Kansas Sens. Laurie Bleeker and Don Biggs view the Strecker-Nelson Gallery after a meeting about raising funds and awareness for Kansas art programs. The statewide tour is an attempt to convince the rest of the Kansas Legislature of the need funding.

"We suck bad. That's what it comes down to," she said. "It's a piddly amount."

Sen. Paul Feleciano, D-Wichita, said a joint committee on art and culture was formed to help create awareness in legislators and across the state. The committee met with Rogers this week to learn more about Manhattan's art scene and the importance of improving funding.

They toured the Strecker-Nelson Gallery, visited the Manhattan Daycare, met with Mayor Karen McCulloh and heard various presentations about different art programs in the city.

Manhattan is excelling in bringing art to the community with the little money they have, Feleciano said.

"It's fantastic," he said. "It appears they're doing the right things."

The role of the committee, after it tours the state, is to convince the rest of the Kansas Legislature of the need for funding.

Feleciano said he understands that budget cuts are necessary, but better planning would help lessen the blow.

"It's priorities. When times are tough, arts and culture are the least-funded," he said.

"We should have been funding it when we had a billion dollar surplus."

One thing the Manhattan Arts Center can do is lobby their representatives for increased funding, since art is underrated in this state, Feleciano said.

"We rank almost dead last. That's disgraceful," he said. "Art, culture and music is vitally important to the make-up of a person."

Art education is the first step to improving funding, Rogers said.

"It's an education process," he said. "We don't educate our legislators about importance of arts, especially related to children."

It is especially important for children to be exposed to art, Winter said.

"It's one of the languages children use to express feelings," she said.

Regina Banks, program development director for Manhattan Boys and Girls Club, said all students deserve to excel in something.

"There are kids who excel in athletics and sports," she said.

"But there are also kids who are creative, and sometimes we don't focus on them enough."

Electives give students chance to experience wide range of classes

By JESSICA PITTS
Kansas State Collegian

To fill an extra time slot in next semester's schedule, students are looking beyond the more traditional classes.

"Students tend to gear their electives towards a territory that students haven't been exposed to in their major," said Judy Lynch, director of the Academic Assistant Center. "In my experience, students want to enroll in classes like Women's Studies, Fiction Into Film and History of Baseball. Those have been some of the popular electives lately."

Julie Katz, business adviser, said she agreed that her students tend to go toward elective classes that have a certain interest to them.

"They look for the fun classes," Katz said. "Golf class, Ballroom Dancing and Drugs and Behavior have been some that students are requesting. They are the more interesting classes, as far as what students have told me."

Megan Murphy, junior in horticulture, said when she chooses electives, she tries to gear them towards something that would maintain her attention throughout the class.

"I have always wanted to take floral design, because I am interested in the floral industry," Murphy said. "The class sounds awesome because it would be hands-on experience."

Brooke Fields, junior in horticulture, said she also looks for classes that are hands-on.

"I want to take a class in ceramics," she said. "I want to take one because it is all you. You control the wheel and the way your pot comes out. I love that stuff. I could stay in that class all day."

Lynch also said some classes seem to be popular with students because of their high enrollment.

"Classes like general Psychology and Introduction to Sociology seem to be in high demand, but it is because most of these classes are basic requirements for a lot of curriculum," she said.

Scott Jones, assistant dean of Student Life Office, said he agrees that classes that seem most popular are those that are required for several different degrees.

"Accounting is definitely a popular class for the main reason that it covers a broad range of requirements," Jones said. "However, if you ask students if it is their favorite class, you may get a different answer. Classes that tend to be popular with students are electives the provide personal enrichment."

Kelli Cox, assistant director of planning and analysis, said while they don't have any specific statistics on popular classes, the larger ones seem to be the ones nearly every student has to take.

"The normal ones like English, math and biology certainly have larger enrollment, but it is not because they are popular among students," she said. "It is for the sheer fact that they are mandatory and will draw more students."

Manhattan arts thrive despite low state funds

Kansas is ranked 45th in the nation in terms of funding for the arts. This is an increase by four notches in the past three years. That is beyond pathetic.

It is essential that there is more funding for art programs. With the small amount of funding the Little Apple receives, it has done a wonderful job.

The Manhattan Arts Center receives money from the Kansas Arts Commission and, in turn, funds after-school activities, memberships and foundations.

The arts center, along with other local venues, helps to bring music, art and culture into this region that would otherwise be overlooked.

One of the most influential aspects in regards to the arts is the MAC truck program.

The MAC truck visits preschools, 17 after-school programs and especially focuses on lower-income families that usually don't have the means to purchase their own art supplies.

It is time to speak out about how important arts are to our community. There are a variety of things students can do. First, support the arts by attending functions that increase awareness or display it.

Another important thing is to let our state representatives know how important the arts are to us. Get on the Web site www.ink.org and find legislators' addresses. Listed below are two important representatives to help you get started.

Kent Glasscock is a member of the Kansas House of Representatives. You can e-mail him at glasscock@house.state.ks.us or write to him at P.O. Box 37, Manhattan, KS 66505. Or you can call him at 539-5301.

Lana Oleen is a member of the Kansas Senate. You can e-mail her at oleen@senate.state.ks.us or write to her at 3000 Stagg Hill Road, Manhattan, KS 66502-3202. Or you can call her at 537-3300.

Don't wait for someone else to speak first. We are ashamed at how low Kansas is ranked in terms of funding for something so important.

CAMPUS fourum 395-4444

The Collegian's Campus Fourum is an anonymous call-in system that allows readers to voice their opinions on topics relevant to the publication.

I would just like to say I will not vote for an extra $6.50 for a student activity center. Maybe if they would come up with an idea for parking, more students would be willing to vote for an increase in student fees.

By teaching creationism in a public school, regardless of what class it is taught in, the school no longer maintains religious neutrality. It exhibits a distinctly pro-Christian bias.

I just thought I would say that Ken Wells is the best thing that the Collegian has going for it.

It's all about loyalty.

Lafene has a lack of parking? What about the rest of the university?

If Lafene is moving off campus, you might as well get rid of it all together, because we will go somewhere better.

Hey, Rick Wooten — why stop at the right to vote? Why don't you take away their right to life while you are at it?

I would think anybody that lived in Goodnow or Marlatt Hall would think that moving Lafene to Sunset, Mercy Health Center would be pretty darn convenient.

Yeah, need more room for Lafene? Tear down Denison. It's ugly anyway.

Indifferent vs. Undecided

Lack of quality, interesting candidates spawns indifference in voters

MIAH WHITAKER

When I'm asked if I'm a Republican or a Democrat, I usually answer that I'm indifferent.

That doesn't mean I'm undecided. Undecided implies that I haven't made up my mind about the issue, and that's not true. I've made up my mind. I've just decided that basing your vote strictly on what party the candidate belongs to is a moronic thing to do.

Not that my method of deciding is any less stupid. I base my decision on a mixture of gut reactions, a careful examination of a limited number of facts and a complete lack of intelligent reasoning.

I spent a few minutes looking at my roommate Jason's absentee ballot. Kansas has seven different presidential hopefuls on the ballot. Seven. I admit, I hadn't really noticed there were more than the big three. I promise to hang my head in shame later, really, I will.

Of the seven, I've never even heard of three of them. I have no clue who Hagelin and Ticciati, Phillips and Frazier, or Browne and Olivier are.

The Reform candidates are Buchanan and Foster. When Jason told me the Buchanan in question was none other than the perennial Pat Buchanan, I was stunned. I was sure I'd heard that he was dead a few years ago. Guess I was wrong.

As for Nader and LaDuke, I'm afraid I was soured on them, when Jason started dancing around the house chanting, "Nader, Nader, Nader, Nader, Nader, Nader."

Tell me that's not irritating.

The Republican candidates are Bush and Cheney. I seem to be the only person bothered by the "Twilight Zone"/genetic clone thing going on with George W. Bush. The man scares me. He's an exact duplicate of his father, yet he bears an uncanny resemblance to Alfred E. Neuman. He's also not the brightest candidate this year.

ADAM HAYES/Collegian

Do we really want another George Bush in office after we voted the first one out after just one term?

Of course, the Democratic candidates are Gore and Lieberman. One thing you can say about Gore is that there is almost no chance that hordes of women will speak up after he's elected, claiming he's been doing obscene things with them. Jason emphatically refuses to vote for Gore because he claims Gore is "too liberal." When he says this, others nod in understanding. I'm not sure I get it. I've asked what he means, but he just mumbles something about the environment and the World Trade Organization and says it's difficult to explain. Jason is anti-WTO.

The only candidate who Jason and I can agree on isn't even on the ballot. We've decided the best person for the job is Elizabeth Dole. Jason is in favor of her because she's conservative. I'm in favor of her because she's not Hagelin, Nader, Phillips, Browne, Bush or Gore. We are urging everyone to write Elizabeth Dole in the write-in blank on the election ballot.

So there you have it. I'm not undecided — I'm just indifferent.

Public should celebrate literacy with writings

guest view
ERIN DOWNEY HOWERTON

You might not be aware that today is the first day of the Flinthills Literary Festival, sponsored by the Department of English. It's a wonderful free event on campus, but I find that this annual occasion begs an important question: why, exactly, is writing such a big deal? Why should we celebrate writing?

Let's start there.

Even though we're embedded in a culture which burns hot with multimedia passion, books still play a central role in our lives. Let's face it, everyone at this university pays homage to the written word in one way or another. If we didn't, there wouldn't be five bookstores within walking distance of campus.

In these paper-filled businesses, we trade books for more books, caress the covers of new texts for classes, snatch clean, pulpy-smelling volumes for our own pleasure and pick up magazines and newspapers to find out what's happening in all corners of the globe. It is something perennial and unavoidable, this consumption of writing. Yet, the actual act of writing resembles the night: mysterious, beautiful and exotic.

Indeed, writing is an art which largely remains in the dark. We all do it at one level or another, but many assume there is some great mysterious gift in composing works like "The Illiad." This assumption is not entirely true. Albert Einstein remarked that genius is one percent inspiration and 99 percent perspiration, and this definitely is true in the writing world.

Stringing sentences together, like gleaming beads on a chain, usually is dismissed as the work of a muse which visits the chosen (at night, perhaps?). There is a misconception that books like "War and Peace" and "Gone With The Wind" were birthed entirely whole, popped up naturally from the writer, as if one decided to spit out a gum ball.

That also is not entirely true.

Writing more closely resembles gardening in its requirements for accomplishment. There is a need to work the ground from which one wants to harvest. Then ideas are planted from various places, and it might take considerable patience to try to make the ground suit the seeds.

The next stage is the most difficult; waiting patiently for germination is like waiting for your writing to make sense in your head. What you want to say might be more complex than you first envisioned and rumination is needed to let the viable shoots peek out from the fertile ground.

Then, you must weed. At its most ruthless writing is revision, where the weak and the unclear must make way for the strong and salient ideas, which you want to nurture further. Just as one crop might be ready for harvest, the writer will find that there is a need to look forward to the next planting. Writing, like life, is more process than end product.

"Writers live twice," Natalie Goldberg said. There's a certain amount of insanity involved in the dedication to reliving moments and concentrating on the abstract, trying to make it more concrete. Writers keep vigil with their ideas, rolling words over and over in their heads and on their tongues. Writing is sacred in its mystery and profane in its truths — that time and labor are the deciding factors which weed great literature for both the writer and the reader.

So why should we celebrate this process and its harvested fruit?

Writers touch our lives in poetry, prose, essay memoir and much more. A good book can be enjoyed with friends, in classes, alone relaxing in a bathtub or even while using mass transit. How many other things in your life are as useful in so many different venues? By necessity of daily living we must be readers, but isn't a fat volume of essays more pleasurable to read over your latte than a street sign? The latter definitely have their purpose, but the former is able to conjure up more than mere location.

Reading is also an important catalyst for change. A thought-provoking book has the power to change the way people see the world: it can start wars, begin friendships, create fantasies and capture imagination. Many people remember the first book they read as vividly as their first kiss. Reading also is able to follow you through life. The stories and poetry of youth segue into the articles and essays of adulthood, bringing about new modes of thinking and reasoning. Reading has a way of defining stages of your life, like no other media has the capability to do. If scents have a powerful connection with memory, books must have much the same effect on people.

One of the things I've enjoyed most about being in college is the opportunity to hear the writers read their own works. It's a rare opportunity to listen to the words spring to life from their pages; breathed into existence yet again by the author, who spent considerable time and effort on their development. If you do nothing else this weekend, take the time to go to the readings hosted by the English Department at the Flinthills Literary Festival. The writers being showcased are kind enough to share their personal experience with the mysterious art and are more than willing to entertain us with their talent. Few things are more romantic, exhilarating and inspirational as a public reading - bring along a good friend, a date or someone you know who loves a good story.

Celebrate the written word. It makes wonderful things possible for both readers and writers, and at the very least deserves a weekend dedication to it in Manhattan.

Voting for Bush worthless in primarily Republican region

Editor,

Having carefully considered the political structure of the United States for the past several years, I feel I can only give my recommendation to someone completely random for president. This is not, as some may assume, in mockery of the many celebrity endorsements that we have seen recently, but rather because the American political system currently makes a mockery of the idea of "one citizen, one vote."

As some few know, I am registered to vote in the state of Kansas. While many labor under the mistaken belief that my vote simply will go into a nationwide pool to determine who becomes president, this is inaccurate. My vote will go into a statewide pool to determine who the state of Kansas elects to the Electoral College. Given that the state is overwhelmingly Republican, my vote for Al Gore, Ralph Nader, or anyone you care to name, except George Bush, would be roughly as meaningless as driving down to the coast, dropping my pants on the seashore, and urinating in the ocean; i.e. while it will disgust those around me, it will have no appreciable effect on whatever body of water I happen to be aiming at.

Thus, my vote is hereby offered to someone completely random. My current plan is to take several dice into the polling station with me and roll randomly; it will have as much appreciable effect as voting for any but Bush, if one resides in a predominantly Republican state. Should I see an item on the ballot, however, that calls for the abolishment of the Electoral College by amendment of the Constitution, I would do so without fail, so my votes in presidential elections of the future might again mean something.

Student activity center funds need to be used elsewhere

Editor,

I am writing this letter to the editor, because I am sick of hearing about how Student Senate wants to create this new student activities center. That idea, to me, is so far off base.

According to the Manhattan Mercury, Phil Stein, Interfraternity Council vice president, was quoted as saying, "In the past, there has been some animosity between greeks and non-greeks, usually referred to as 'independents,'" and the cure to this would be putting up a new building. To me that seems way off base. A building is not going to get rid of something that has been part of college society for so long. This building is not only a waste of my money but everyone else's.

Good communication is not made in a building or through this idea that an activities center is going to bring all this past aggression to an end. To me, this activities center seems like a plan by the Senate to leave its mark, so when its members graduate and move on, they can say they accomplished something, and the building can be their proof.

Also, the university promised $2.2 million of the overall $4.8 million cost. I ask you why can't they take that $2.2 million and make some repairs to the buildings we have now? Get rid of Denison Hall and build a building that actually works. There are so many more projects and things that could get done with that $2.2 million that a building should not be first on the agenda.

I know Senate is supposed to represent the student body, but right now they are acting totally independently. I leave you with this quote by Brian Koval, "The most important part of being a leader is maintaining the desire to keep on learning. That means learning about yourself, about your peers and about the people you serve."

House resolution supports Israel

By PAULINE JELINEK
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C.— The House approved a resolution Wednesday condemning Palestinians for the violence with Israel despite warnings that it would inflame passions and undermine the U.S. role, as a broker for peace in the region.

On a vote of 365-30, the House called on Palestinian leadership to stop the violence, refrain from making public statements that incite the public and settle its grievances through negotiations.

The nonbinding resolution expresses the House's solidarity with the state and people of Israel at this time of crisis and condemns the Palestinian leadership for "encouraging the violence and doing so little for so long to stop it."

The vote Wednesday afternoon followed an hour-long debate Tuesday, during which Rep. James P Moran, D-Va., warned against taking sides and therefore further inflaming the rage and despair in the region. He said the National Security Council and State Department had the House to reject the resolution.

But that clearly was a minority viewpoint.

"We need to pass this resolution to assure that the Congress of the United States sends a clear message in support of peace and the State of Israel," Rep. Benjamin A. Gilman, R-N.Y., said opening the debate.

The vote comes only days after the Palestinians won U.N. admonition of Israel in a General Assembly resolution condemning the excessive use of force by Israelis against Palestinians civilians in the three weeks of fighting.

Rep. Henry A. Waxman, D-Calif, said the House had to adopt its resolution partly in response to that Friday vote in favor of Palestinians at the United Nations.

"The refusal of (Palestinian leader Yasser) Arafat to do anything, except turn to international organizations that have always been biased against Israel ... to try to point fingers at Israel ... makes it incumbent on us, the only superpower in the world ... to stand with Israel."

Several representatives spoke against the House resolution.

"We should be standing here today urging both parties instead to ... the negotiating table and help them find the way back toward the road to peace," Rep. Nick J. Rahall, D-W.Va., said. "This resolution condemns one side and it inflames passions. It is about bashing the Palestinians."

"Ask yourself if that works for peace, if that enables us to function as honest brokers," said Rep. John Dingell, D-Mich., adding that passing the resolution would be "throwing away ... the opportunity to achieve peace."

Rep. Tom Lantos, D-Calif., blamed Arafat for the stall in peace talks.

"Arafat's latest contribution to this dialogue was to tell the prime minister of Israel to 'go to hell.' It's difficult to be an honest broker under those circumstances. It's our job to stand up with the only political democracy in the Mideast."

The resolution also urges the Clinton administration to use its veto power at the U.N. Security Council to ensure that it does not again adopt unbalanced resolutions on the violence between Israelis and Palestinians.

SGA works to promote center

By REED DUNN
Kansas State Collegian

Student government representatives sponsored a forum at noon Wednesday to answer questions about the proposed student activities center.

Julie Karrer, chair of the activities center committee, said the forum was one of several appearances senators have planned to help inform students of the concept.

"What we're doing right now is working to get the word out by the referendum on Nov. 9," she said.

Another forum has been scheduled for noon on Nov. 2 in the Union Courtyard. At 6 that evening, there also will be an open presentation in the Union Big 12 Room.

"We wanted an easy way to get the word out to a large group of people," Karrer said. "We're trying to reach as many students as possible."

A survey done last year showed 80 percent of the 375 groups and organizations were in agreement the concept would be beneficial, Travis Lenkner, Student Senate chair, said.

"The center would be a place where students can come together to improve student life on this campus," Lenkner said.

Passing the referendum on the proposed $4.8 million project would have students paying no more than $6.50 per semester to provide about $1.8 million for the center. Another $2.2 million has been committed to the project from university funds.

If students vote in favor of funding the center, Lenkner said the KSU Foundation has also committed to raising at least $500,000 to support the overall cost of the 16,500-square-foot structure.

Dana Pracht, student body vice president, said she wants students to have chances to ask questions and be most informed of the plan. She said the forums are the best way to communicate with all students.

"The more we talk to students, the more they'll understand the concept," she said.

STEVEN DEARINGER/Collegian

K-State Student Body Vice President Dana Pracht discusses the proposed student activities center on Wednesday afternoon in the K-State Student Union.

Pracht said one of the most recognizable benefits for students is the availability of resources for all students.

"The student activity center would be open 24 hours a day," she said. "Being students ourselves, we know students don't work on an 8 to 5 schedule."

The concept will be put to referendum Nov. 9, with voting hours from 7 a.m. to 7 p.m. in the Union Courtyard, Jake Worcester, student body president, said. He said even though there is only one place for voting on campus, he said he thinks students who care either way about the center will make time to fill out their ballot.

"We think that if students are interested, they will get to the Union to vote," Worcester said. "We're fortunate enough that we have small campus, and you can get almost anywhere with a 10-minute walk."

Having forums is an important part of the entire process, Worcester said.

"I think the good thing about the open forum is it allows students to come and ask questions," he said. "It gives us an opportunity to share our vision on a more personal basis."

Women's rowing team meets goal

■ Crew establishes standards for success, looks for NCAA Championship invitation.

By DAN SMITH
Kansas State Collegian

To some around the country, Kansas is a place rich in cows and wheat, and not much else.

Head crew coach Jenny Hale was reminded of this fact during an early recruiting visit on the East Coast, when some of the women were confused.

"Sometimes they would say things like, 'Is there water in Kansas?'" Hale said.

However, nothing changes perception like winning, and the Wildcat crew's early success in the 2000 season has done exactly that, Hale said.

"It's changed a ton from the first year, when the kids would roll their eyes and laugh," she said. "There have been very few crews in the Midwest, and we've built a good team from the foundation up."

Head novice coach Kevin Harris also has noticed the change in the way the Cats now are perceived at the team's regattas, and said it's nice to finally get the respect that they deserve.

Now, Harris said, schools are aiming for the Wildcat crew team instead of laughing at them.

"I'm very excited about it," Harris said of the team's accomplishments so far this season. "I think a lot of them are really scared that they have to race against us, because we're on our way up."

That recognition, and the success that it demands, comes from within the program, as well as from other Division I rowing teams, junior Josie McClellan said.

"We're definitely gunning for that top spot," McClellan said, "but there are a lot of K-State women wanting to knock us down too. That is what we set out to do."

After winning every race in which they were entered at the American Royal Fall Rowing Classic from Sept. 13 to 5 in Kansas City, Mo., the crew headed to Boston, Sept. 22 for their fourth appearance at the prestigious Head of the Charles regatta.

Hale set a goal before the race for the crew to finish in the top 20, and the team did not let her down, providing the program its best finish ever, 17th out of 57 boats.

"It was a really big milestone for us," Hale said.

"We've been chipping away at that top 20 for a couple of years now," she said. "We knew they were capable of stepping up, and I was happy with our young team's finish."

Although the team is content with its success in Boston, freshman coxswain Jane Smedley said the team will have to be ready for this weekend's regatta in Iowa City when the Cats match up against another Head of the Charles team, the University of Iowa.

"We're looking to hang with Iowa and hopefully beat them," Smedley said of this weekend's race.

The Hawkeyes finished in 10th place in the three-mile Boston regatta, a full two seconds ahead of the Wildcats.

Hale said this race will be a good opportunity to see where the Cats are at this point in the year.

"Iowa is always a great barometer," Hale said of next weekend's match up. "If we can hang with Iowa, that is great for our program."

The ultimate goal for the crew team is to gain an invitation to the NCAA championships, Smedley said, but both Hale and Harris understand the difficult nature of such a goal in a region that is widely regarded as the toughest in the country.

"The Central region is the strongest and the biggest, so getting a bid to the NCAA's is a tough bet, but I think these girls can do it," Harris said.

Hale said she agreed.

"We set high standards, and I have some tremendous coaches with me that have brought some high expectations with them," she said. "We're still in a developing stage, and we want to do well in our region."

K-State set a standard last weekend with its finish in Boston, but the crew believes it can be even better than that, McClellan said.

"We want to go to the NCAA championships, and it's going to take that belief to get there."

READY TO RUN

Athletes prepare for Big 12 Championships

By JASON ARY
Kansas State Collegian

After a two-week break, the K-State cross country squads return to action this weekend as they travel to Boulder, Colo., to compete in the fifth-annual Big 12 Championships.

The Wildcats are looking to improve off of their Oct. 14th performance at the Pre-NCAA Invitationals, which saw the fifth-ranked women finish 8th, with the men's team at 41st.

However, since that event, head coach Randy Cole said strides of improvement have been made.

"We've had some good, quality, sharp workouts," Cole said. "We are in as good as shape as possible."

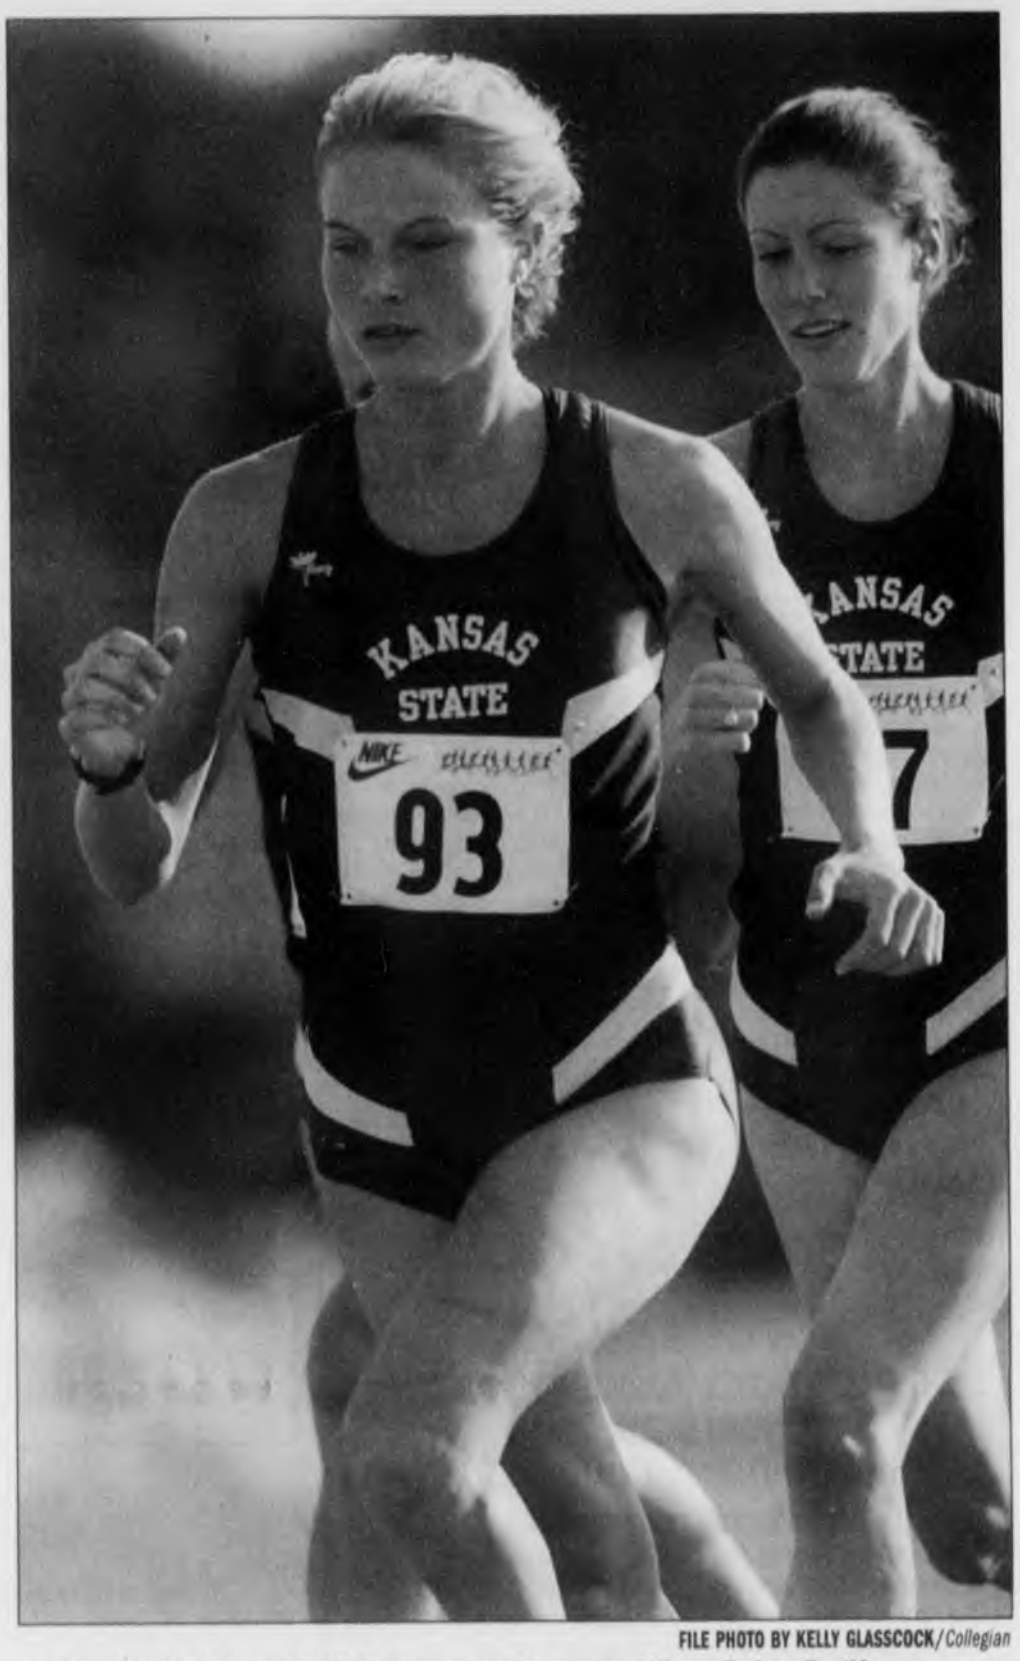
Senior Reid Christianson said he felt much was learned from the Pre-NCAA tourney, which fielded more than 300 runners from more than fifty teams.

"I noticed how we can really run together," Christianson said. "We have the ability to come together as a team."

The event, which will be at Colorado's Buffalo Ranch, will be more strenuous than previous meets, largely due to the 5,350-foot altitude, Cole said.

"If you get there three or four days before (the meet), you begin to get sluggish," he said. "So we are getting there Friday, racing on Saturday, then heading home."

While the altitude will make things more difficult, junior Shadrack Kimeli said it won't make a huge impact on the outcome of the race.



"(The teams) are all in the same boat," Kimeli said, "so it's not going to help anyone out."

While the visiting teams will have to battle the lack of oxygen, the University of Colorado will be enjoying the benefit of training and living at a mile above sea level.

Colorado is ranked No. 1 in the men's poll and replaces the Wildcat women at the No. 5 spot in the women's poll. Since the inception of the Big 12 Championships in 1996, the CU men's team has won all four titles, and the women have won three, with K-State taking home a title in 1998.

For the Wildcats, the women's team will look to rebound after falling to ninth in the Finish Lynx NCAA poll. All-Americans Korene Hinds, Amy Mortimer and Annie Wetterhus will have their eyes set on the Buffaloes' Kara Wheeler, who is considered by many to be the premiere female cross-country runner in the nation.

Meanwhile, the K-State men are hoping to show some improvement after their performance at the Pre-NCAA Invitationals. Kimeli and senior Jean-Paul Niyongabo both finished in the top 25 individually, while no other Wildcat finished in the top 300.

Equestrian team returns to West Texas A&M

By STEVEN DEARINGER
Kansas State Collegian

K-State's Western equestrian team is back in the saddle Saturday when they returns to West Texas A&M in Canyon, Texas, for its second meet of the season.

The two-Western competition is set for 9 a.m. Saturday. After taking second and having two fourth-place finishes in the Oct. 6-8 shows, the equestrian team is excited for this weekend's competition, open-class rider Kelly Gratny said.

"I'm really looking forward to this weekend," she said. "We knew what we needed to work on from the last show, and we have focused on those key points and really improved."

That improvement has come from getting more time in the saddle and having good practices, head coach Teresa Slough said.

Kelly Gratny, open-class rider, competes Oct. 7 at West Texas A&M. Gratny and the Western equestrian team travel back to Canyon, Texas for their second meet of the year Saturday.

STEVEN DEARINGER/Collegian

"We are much more prepared for this weekend's show," she said. "Girls are looking much better and are becoming more comfortable in the saddle."

And in the first season, inexperience is fading fast, Slough said.

"I have seen the most improvement in the lower classes since the last competition," she said. " The beginning class has really come along." The team has had three weeks to prepare since its last meet, but Slough said the weather hasn't been in the riders' favor.

"Practice has been hampered this week because of the rain, but last week's practices were good," she said.

Even though riders haven't had the practices they would have liked this week, they are ready for this weekend, open-class rider Nichole Bredfeldt said.

"We know what to expect since it is at the same college," she said. "We know what the horses are like and how to prepare for them, so I think it will be a good weekend."

Past weekend full of surprises, exhibits improbabilities in NFL

MIKE VIETTI

I must have missed something last week.

Were all nine planets in alignment? Did we have four or five eclipses? Was the antichrist born while that wannabe "Exorcist" movie was on Showtime? Did Keyshawn Johnson keep his mouth shut for longer than five minutes?

Something must have happened, because after watching the outcome of week eight in the NFL, I'm left with one question: "What in the wide, wide world of sports is going on here?"

Seriously now, I haven't had any college physics classes, but the NFL somehow defied that relativity thing and turned itself upside down all in just a few days.

Here's a rundown of the most improbable of all improbable things that happened this past weekend.

1. Rams lose (in multiple ways).

Kurt Warner's gone for 4-6 weeks, but that's not even the main issue — how could this team have lost to the Chiefs? How could this team have given up 362 passing yards to Elvis Grbac? How many more questions like this are there about this game? Thousands is the answer. The Rams should be fine with Trent Green filling in at quarterback — he threw three touchdowns against the Chiefs, but good Lord, the Rams defense is borderline horrific. Now, I know you Chiefs fans usually are pretty fair weather, but there isn't a single one of you out there who could have pictured how this game unfolded — and don't even try because we all know you're lying.

2. Bengals win a game (and set some records, too).

It was tough trying to decide what was the bigger absurdity — Cincy winning a game or Corey Dillon setting the all-time rushing record in a game with 278 yards. I went with the Bengals winning a game, against the Broncos no less, but Dillon was pretty impressive. To think, this guy was rumored to be on the trading-block a month ago for a second round draft pick. Just think where the Chiefs would be if they could have pulled that one off.

3. The NFL's best defense gives up 30 points — in one quarter.

Perhaps the Dolphins used to have the league's best defense. Words can't describe how pissed I was (fan of the Fins ever since I can remember) watching this game from Rusty's on Monday. We went at halftime at 10 and the game lasted until midnight because Vinny "I sucked horribly for three quarters, sold my soul to the devil, and then looked like I did in a Hurricanes uniform" Testaverde led the Jets to a 40-37 win. Seriously, if anybody out there can help me perform a seance with Lucifer, let me know, because there's just no way Vinny could have done that on his own.

4. Trent Dilfer plays again — and it's not because every other QB in the world died in a plane crash.

OK, so maybe I went overboard a little bit. I guess Scott Mitchell wasn't on the plane, either, so Dilfer isn't the worst QB in the world. I just can't understand how Tony Banks could have screwed this up. The Ravens are coached by Brian Billick, one of the best offensive minds in football, have Shannon Sharpe, Qadry Ismail, and Travis Taylor to throw to, and either Jamal Lewis or Priest Holmes to hand the ball off to. The line is decent enough, as well. But don't worry, Tony, you'll be starting again after Trent leads the Ravens to a loss against the ever-improving Steelers next week.

5. The NFC's second best team loses — again.

Sure the Lions are 5-2, but there's no reason why Tampa Bay should have lost this game, or any of the four in a row the Bucs have dropped. I personally believe The Almighty is punishing the "All-Mouth Team." Keyshawn, Warren — perhaps it's time to take some mime lessons.

Russian arms sales to Iran sparks national attention

By BARRY SCHWEID
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The State Department said Wednesday there was no secret deal by the Clinton administration allowing Russian arms sales to Iran and endangering national security.

An understanding between Vice President Al Gore and then-Prime Minister Viktor Chernomyrdin in 1995 was announced publicly, said John P. Barker, deputy assistant secretary of state for nonproliferation control.

Barker said some documents relating to the understanding remain classified. He cautioned a Senate Foreign Relations subcommittee that continued news coverage of the agreement could undermine nonproliferation efforts, which he said require confidentiality.

Barker testified at a hearing called by Republican members of the committee to air allegations that the deal allowed Russia to sell weapons to Iran in violation of a 1992 U.S. law prohibiting sales to countries viewed as exporters of terrorism.

The committee also was looking into charges that details of the understanding were kept from members of Congress until reported in newspaper articles earlier this month.

"When congressmen and senators have to turn to newspapers, as opposed to the White House to be fully informed on U.S. foreign policy, this is not right," Sen. Gordon H. Smith, R-Ore., said.

But Barker said Congress was briefed on the understanding, although "of course, certain sensitive documents were classified and were closely held in the executive branch."

Barker said although press reports in recent days have disclosed some classified information, confidentiality still is needed to further nonproliferation work.

"Playing this out in the press can only have a chilling effect on our ability to continue the process and could seriously undermine the U.S. national security interests at stake," he said.

Lack of enthusiasm plagues elections

■ Boredom, voter apathy apparent as Nov. 7 nears.

By WILL LESTER
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Public enthusiasm for Al Gore's personality is down, doubts about George W. Bush's priorities and experience are up and times are thought to be generally good.

No wonder the pool of voters, who could change their minds, hasn't budged in the last two weeks, according to a new poll. And never mind that the presidential election is in 13 days.

Almost one-fourth of the electorate has yet to finally decide whom to vote for Nov. 7. And many swing back and forth, putting Republican Bush ahead late last week, before he settled into a near tie with Democrat Gore this week in the closest presidential race in 40 years.

Voter preference among certain groups shifted significantly in the past couple of weeks, with younger voters moving toward Gore, voters 65 and older leaning slightly away and men younger than 50 shifting away from Bush in the poll by the Pew Research Center for the People & the Press.

"There's a lot of shifting around, even though the overall horse race hasn't changed much," said Andrew Kohut, director of the Pew Research Center.

The survey of 663 likely voters taken from Wednesday to Sunday showed the race deadlocked at 45 percent apiece. The error margin was 4.5 percentage points.

"Gore's personality has become a bigger negative than it was in September," Kohut said. "You would have to point to the debates as a cause of that."

But Kohut said Bush has yet to close the deal with a substantial number of voters.

"While Bush has made some progress in personal terms, he hasn't made much of a dent in gaining voter confidence on the top issues," Kohut said.

"The toughest criticisms have to do with his record in Texas and caring more about rich people," he added. "Those appear to be most effective among nonwhites and members of union households, core Democratic groups that Gore needs to energize."

Several recent polls have suggested Democrats have more work to do to get their voters to the polls because of lower enthusiasm for Gore.

Gore still leads on top issues like health care, Social Security and the economy. Bush is ahead on personal traits — honesty, likability, willingness to take an unpopular stand and having new ideas.

Asked who is best described by the phrase "typical politician," 45 percent picked Gore and 29 percent picked Bush.

Three-fourths of voters had heard the charge that Bush cares more about the rich, and three in 10 said that made them less likely to support him.

Two-thirds said they've heard that Gore can't be trusted and tends to exaggerate, and a fourth said that makes their support for him less likely. Just over half have heard that Gore wants to bring back the era of big government, and one in five said that makes them less likely to support him.

But most voters, 54 percent, are satisfied with the way things are going nationally — as high as the satisfaction level has been in Pew polls all year.

Some say this only adds to the level of indecision.

"They're perfectly content with either candidate," said Stephen Hess, a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution. "If it has to be Gore, that's OK. If it has to be Bush, that's OK.

"There's nothing in terms of the candidates themselves that has shaken this general air of lethargy, a contentment-induced lethargy," he said.

"Number one, there's a distrust of the Republican Party. Even though the religious right is quiet right now, there's a fear that Bush would have to live up to their expectations," said Lowell Weicker, a former Republican senator and ex-independent governor of Connecticut.

"Number two, there's a fatigue factor with President Clinton and, fair or not, it extends to Gore."

is worth as much as $10 million.

The TRIGA, Training Research and Isotopes General Atomic, is used on a daily basis for tours, experiments, demonstrations and research analysis. Students have already explored neutron activation analysis, neutron radiography and material irradiations with the reactor.

"We constantly give tours to people anywhere from Manhattan to St. Louis and attract others to K-State with the amazing machinery," Michael Whaley, nuclear reactor manager, said.

Not only do students use the facility for research and learning, but as an introduction to future employment. After taking a training course, including how to operate the machine, students receive pay to test new materials.

"Students taking nuclear engineering experience the operation and use of a nuclear reactor, which is an opportunity that is not offered at most universities," Shultis said.

Concerns on the safety of the large reactors were recently made as the University of Missouri Research Reactor was cited, but not fined, for violations earlier this month.

"We have no reason to be concerned here at K-State, because our facility is very different from the one in Missouri, because we do not use the type of fuel they use in our operations," Whaley said.

Along with the outstanding transactions the nuclear reactor is capable of, there are many dangerous issues involved. Researching neutron reactions, nuclear fission, radioactive exposure and radiation requires safety and security procedures.

"It is imperative that we repeatedly check all areas of the reactor to prevent any harmful situations," Whaley said.

There are a series of checks that are completed before using the machine every day. Also, to assure that no procedure violations have been made, the reactor is investigated weekly, monthly and annually.

"We have such vast technology and safety precautions already enforced that nothing harmful could ever happen to any person, if they are following the correct rules when using it," Whaley said.

A few positioned tasks that the Mark II does automatically to secure safety include the machine shutting down immediately as the temperature increases. Also, it is cooled by natural convection, precipitation and air.

"I have worked at a number of other reactors and found that this particular one is an exceptionally safe design and a completely phenomenal machine," Whaley said.

ATTACK

of terrorism could potentially occur in the coming weeks or months," Roberts said.

Roberts said he wanted to know whether the reference to potential for additional acts of terrorism in coming weeks played a role in last weekend's decision to put U.S. forces in Bahrain and Qatar on high alert.

Walter Slocombe, the undersecretary of defense for policy, who testified before the committee along with Army Gen. Tommy Franks, commander in chief of U.S. Central Command, did not directly answer Roberts' question. Slocombe did, however, indicate the Pentagon had no specific information about a likely terrorist attack against an American target in the Gulf prior to the Cole bombing.

"Information of that kind, if it had existed — which it didn't — would have been disseminated on the most urgent basis to all the people who were potentially affected by it," Slocombe told the committee.

PUMPKIN

By JJ DUNCAN
Kansas State Collegian

Nut bars, soup, bread, muffins, cheesecake, and oh yeah, you can make pies out of pumpkins, too.

The fruit commonly found guilty of being an accessory to vandalism and used for carving spooky jack-o-lanterns has many recipes for which it can be put to use. Karen Blakeslee, extension associate of the Rapid Response Center, said most people don't think of all the different uses for pumpkin in cooking.

"Every fall, at our home, we make pumpkin nut bars with cream cheese frosting," she said. "If someone likes pumpkin, there is a large variety of recipes to choose from, such as pumpkin bread and even pumpkin ice cream. Since it's fall, they should take advantage of the opportunity and have fun with the recipes."

Since pumpkin is a fruit, it is versatile in its cooking uses, said Ronald Zelch, cake and sweet goods production instructor at the American Institute of Baking.

Common recipes include pumpkin quick breads and muffins. Though pies are common, cooks can distinguish their own style through different recipes and especially the choice of canned pumpkin they use, Zelch said.

"I always order a certain brand of canned pumpkin, and one year our supplier didn't have any of that brand," he said. "I ordered a cheaper brand, and I came up with a completely different pie. The taste, the color, the consistency was all off, and it ruined it for me."

Pumpkin pies are best served fresh because of the chemical composition of the food. Zelch, who grew up working in a bakery, said when he worked in the bakery they would only set pies out for sale that had been baked that day. The rest were sold out of refrigeration.

Because of the short shelf life of the pies, it is impossible to stock up for a big rush in the fall, so there are a few days that are busy, Zelch said.

Generally, pumpkins are higher quality if they have aged for at least a year, said Marvin Willyard, bakery science and management instructor. This means it is best to buy canned pumpkins just before the harvest season in September to ensure that the pumpkin is older.

Zelch said the older pumpkins are preferred by bakers to create a better pie.

"When I used to work in a retail factory, the pumpkins would be stored there for a year, because the bakers said it prevented the pie from cracking," he said.

If someone chooses to use an actual pumpkin as opposed to canned pumpkin, it can be a lengthy process, but it is possible, Willyard said.

"First you have to cut open the pumpkin and clean out the seeds and the stringy stuff," he said. "You also have to carve off the hard rind, because the fruit between the seeds and the rind is what you use for cooking."

After the fruit is removed, it is steamed, then pureed, and the thick liquid can be stored for future use.

Pumpkins also have health benefits, since they are high in vitamin A, potassium and vitamin E, Blakeslee said. They also contain high amounts of the possibly cancer-preventing anti-oxidants.

Many complicated recipes and procedures are available for the use of pumpkins, but sometimes the favorites are the most simple.

"Every year we take our pumpkin seeds and we soak them in saltwater," Zelch said. "Then we roast them on a cookie sheet, and the kids really enjoy that."

Pumpkin recipes

Pumpkin Roll by Marsha Lampe
3 eggs
1 cup sugar
2/3 cup pumpkin
1 t lemon juice
3/4/cup flour
1 t baking powder
1 1/2 t cinnamon
1 t ginger
1/2 t nutmeg
1/2 t salt
1 cup fine chopped nuts

Beat eggs on high until stiff. Gradually add sugar. Stir in pumpkin and lemon juice. Fold dry ingredients in. Spread in greased and wax paper lined 15 x 10 jelly roll pan. Top with nuts and bake at 375 for 15 minutes. After baked, turn out on a tea towel dusted with powdered sugar and roll up to cool completely.

Prepare filling:
1 cup powdered sugar
4 T oleo
8 oz. cream cheese
1/2 t vanilla

Combine and beat until smooth Unroll cooled cake. Spread with filling. Reroll and wrap with plastic wrap and foil until served. Freezes well.

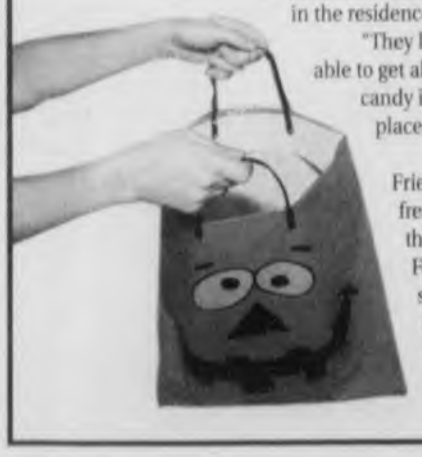
Pumpkin Cake Bars by Pam Powell
4 eggs, well beaten
2 cups cooked pumpkin (1 can)
1 1/2 cup sugar
1/4 t salt
1 t ginger
1 t cinnamon
1/2 t cloves
1 yellow cake mix
1/2 cup oleo (soft)
1 cup nuts

Mix eggs, pumpkin, sugar, salt, ginger, cinnamon & cloves together: pour into a 13 x 9 pan. Mix cake mix and oleo together until crumbly, sprinkle over pumpkin mixture. Spread chopped nuts. Bake at 325 for 1 hour and 20 minutes. (Cover with foil loosely to keep from browning too soon, for first half baking time.) Top with whipped cream to serve.

Caramel Apple Bundt Cake by Pam Powell
3 or 4 tart apples
1 t cinnamon
1 cup cooking oil
1/4 cup orange juice
3 cups flour
1/2 t salt
1/2 cup nuts
3 T sugar
2 cups sugar
4 eggs
2 t vanilla
1 t baking powder
16 caramels

Peel, core and chop apples into small pieces to measure 1 1/2 cups. Mix 3 T sugar and 1 t cinnamon. Set aside. Combine 2 cups sugar and 1 cup oil. Beat and add eggs, orange juice and vanilla. Sift dry ingredients. Add and beat until smooth. Cut caramels into eighths. Pour 1/3 of the batter into greased and floured Bundt pan. Add 1/3 of the caramels, nuts and apple mixture. Repeat layers. Bake 75 minutes at 325.

Candy part of traditions for students, faculty at K-State



Trick-or-treaters visiting Mayor Karen McCulloh will not be disappointed. She said she and her husband always have lots of candy on hand for Halloween.

"We usually have a lot of kids," McCulloh said. "We always just get what's on sale at Dillon's."

McCulloh said she traditionally is host to a costume theme party the weekend before Halloween but did not have time to plan one this year.

She said that when her children were young, they enjoyed trick-or-treating in the residence halls.

"They liked being able to get all of that candy in one place," she said.

Jeni Friend, freshman in theater and Ford Hall social chairwoman, has been involved in the planning of this year's residence hall trick-or-treating. She said residents of Ford and Haymaker halls are teaming up to provide candy and a haunted house for children.

Trick-or-treating will begin at 6:30 p.m. at Ford Hall, with residents offering a variety of candies.

"My friend is dressing up like an M&M package, so she's handing out M&Ms," Friend said. "I'm dressing as an angel, so I'll probably hand out Pixy Stix."

As a young trick-or-treater, Friend said she had the same likes as other children. She said her favorite Halloween candy has always been anything with chocolate.

"I know when I was little, the ones I didn't want to get were the long sticks of bubble gum," she said. "No matter how fresh they were, they were always hard. We used to try and trade them on our younger cousins."

Even though stores like Wal-Mart carry a variety of off-brand Halloween candy, Meko Kahssay, assistant manager, said Snickers, Butterfinger and Twix seem to be the customer favorites.

"Most people are brand-oriented," Kahssay said. "They buy what is called 'Fun Size.' They come in any candy bar you can think of."

Another popular Halloween candy that is the favorite of both Student Body President Jake Worcester and university president Jon Wefald is candy corn. Worcester said he keeps some on his desk.

"It's straight sugar," Worcester said. "There's nothing better."

Worcester and Wefald also share a common bond in the lack of trick-or-treaters to their home residences. Ruth Ann Wefald said she used to make popcorn balls, but quit due to the lack of children coming to the house.

"I usually just have some candy on hand," she said. "I think kids like to go where there are a bunch of houses in a row. We are kind of on an island."

Before Tuesday, Worcester said he and his roommate will make sure to have some candy just in case trick-or-treaters stop by their apartment complex.

"We try not to get prepared too early, or we eat all the candy," he said. "We like for trick-or-treaters to come by, but there usually aren't too many."

"I have parents come in and praise me for this wonderful thing we are doing," she said. "They are really positive about it and usually come in with ideas of what their children can work on. They tell me that the children are making great strides because of this."

Fouquet also said the popularity of the program is growing, which is causing a need for more tutors.

"I have to limit the children to just an hour because of the lack of tutors," she said. "The goal is to have one-on-one relations for as long as is needed, but a lot of the times we have three to five children with one tutor for an hour. It gets pretty hectic."

The tutors usually are volunteers who are involved either in the community service program or are employees or students in the College of Education. However, Fouguet said she welcomes anyone who has the time.

"I have even coaxed friends into helping me," she said. "We really have a need for tutors right now, so I am open to volunteers from all areas, not just the College of Education. All I ask is that they have an interest and will be dedicated to the program."

Janell Butts, senior in elementary education, helps Yuan Jiang, 6, pick out a crayon to do her homework. Butts began tutoring four weeks ago because she is required to do some community service for her major.

Kaylene Kramp, senior in psychology, has been a tutor for the program since it began in September.

"I try to work every Wednesday from 5 to 8 p.m.," she said. "I like working with the kids because they make it a lot of fun to volunteer. I have also traveled to Japan and Mexico, and by tutoring here at Jardine, I am exposed to those cultures and others. I am learning along with the kids."

Janell Butts, senior in elementary education, began tutoring four weeks ago because she is required to do some community service for her major.

"That is why I originally started with the program," Butts said. "But I really do enjoy it. I get to teach the children more than just school work. I am able to teach them about my culture and help them with word association, too."

Fouquet began the program with the hopes of helping the children with their basic school work but is learning that it has grown way beyond that.

"Most of these children are far more advanced than their grade level," she said. "For them, we have brain teasers that stimulate them more or flash cards that maybe give extra help. We try to first help with schoolwork and then anything beyond that is extra enrichment."

Yuan Jiang, 6, said she liked having the tutors help her with her homework.

"It is fun," she said. "I learn spelling and math. Tonight, I got to make a book after I was done with my other homework."

Fouquet said she is lucky because the program has a variety of supplies from which to choose.

"There is really something for everyone," she said. "We feel fortunate because a lot of supplies were donated and those that weren't the department of housing purchased. They recently bought some textbooks that would allow us to make copies of some activities for the children."

Fouquet said she is excited about the program and is glad she was able to have a hand in starting it.

"I really hope it continues, because of all the positive feedback," she said. "I have lived here for six years and worked here for 1 1/2, and I have to say this is one of the best things about Jardine. It benefits so many people."

Then, on June 12, workers conducting routine maintenance failed to take extra precaution changing a control rod. Reactor administrators said personnel were not adequately trained to do that, and that the university's procedure manual was poorly written.

The university must respond to the commission within 30 days with an outline of corrective actions taken and those planned.

The university plans to add staff, work shifts and increase communication between workers and administration.

A second commission investigation, on personnel matters, continues. Deutsch said it's unrelated to the safety violations, but cannot offer further details.

Chase ends with arrest

By JENN DAVOREN
Kansas State Collegian

Officers of the Riley County Police Department were called to take part in a car chase Thursday afternoon as a suspect fled Fort Riley military police.

David Allen Sherwin, 27, 6030 Tuttle Terrace Lot 24, was driving on base when a military police officer noticed him spinning his tires. When the officer attempted to cite Sherwin for an exhibition of acceleration, Sherwin sped away.

During the course of the chase, Sherwin rammed MP vehicles with his car at least twice but continued to elude officers. As he traveled east toward Ogden, Kan., the RCPD was called in around 5:11 p.m. to take part in the chase, said Lt. Kurt Moldrup of the RCPD.

"When they entered our jurisdiction, we took over the chase," he said.

Sherwin's flight continued along Kansas Highway 18, sometimes reaching speeds of more than 80 miles per hour, Moldrup said.

"At some point in Fort Riley, his left rear tire had come off, and he was running on three wheels," he said. "He hit the median a couple of times."

Officers said the chase ended when Sherwin brought his vehicle to a stop at Stagg Hill Road and attempted to take on the officers pursuing him. After a short scuffle, Sherwin was arrested and charged with criminal threat, battery of an officer, reckless driving, fleeing and eluding a police officer, driving on a revoked license and DUI. His bond was set at $8,000.

Moldrup said Sherwin also faces numerous other traffic infractions.

Cat athlete arrested for parking lot incident

By BRYAN MURPHY
Kansas State Collegian

K-State football offensive lineman Matthew Martin was arrested Wednesday by campus police on a felony count of aggravated assault and another count of driving on a suspended license.

Capt. Robert Mellgren of the K-State Police said Martin, 919 Thurston St., got into an argument with a Parking Services attendant in the parking lot south of the K-State Student Union at about 1:25 p.m. Wednesday.

The attendant reportedly was going to issue a wheel lock on Martin's car, and when he became aware of this, Martin threatened to injure the attendant with his car, Mellgren said.

After the argument, Martin got into the car and drove away, nearly hitting the parking attendant in the process and forcing the attendant to jump out of the way, Mellgren said. No party was injured.

K-State police caught up to Martin in the 1500 block of Denison Avenue, at which point he was taken into custody.

After being arrested, Martin was taken to Riley County Jail and his bond was set at $5,000. Martin was released from custody at about 5 p.m. Wednesday.

Sports Information Director Doug Dull was in Kansas City at the time of the incident and could not give any comment on the situation.

By SHANNON MARSHALL
Kansas State Collegian

A consensus has arisen among graduate teaching assistants on campus — they're not here for the money.

Not surprising, considering in 1998 K-State was at the bottom of the median salary scale for GTAs in the Big 12.

According to a report compiled by the Office of Institutional Research in the Division of Planning and Analysis, the Big 12 median GTA salary in 1998 was $10,206, without the average salary of K-State added.

Once K-State's average salary was added, the Big 12 number fell to $9,969.

The median K-State salary includes GTA salaries from every department. Patricia Walters, GTA in the department of biology, said she has concerns about low GTA salaries.

"It's extremely low in our department," she said. "At times, there's a lot of discouragement among the GTAs."

Larry Williams, associate professor and associate Division of Biology, explained how GTA salaries are decided.

"Part of the money is state money, and another part comes from graduate assistantship grants or grant research funds," he said. "That money that we receive limits how many GTAs we can hire. If we don't have the financial support, we don't accept you into the program."

That policy is consistent with other university departments. Virginia Mixer, administrative assistant to the dean of education, said the GTA salaries in the College of Education are decided by legislation and the university budget.

In addition to K-State's low GTA salary ranking among Big 12 schools, it also is low when compared to Ivy League schools such as Harvard University and Stanford University.

A teacher assistant in the biology department at Harvard receives an average yearly salary of $14,240. At Stanford University, the average yearly salary of the same teacher assistant is $20,748. Both these figures have not been adjusted for cost-of-living. At K-State, a teaching assistant in the biology department receives a yearly salary of $13,806, according to fall 1998 statistics.

Anna Gaw, GTA and academic adviser for K-State's College of Education, said she wonders why K-State doesn't increase its GTA salaries.

"I've noticed since working here that the university's pay, overall, seems to be lower than the rest of the Big 12 schools," she said. "I think that's something they should take into consideration if they want the best instructors."

She said K-State should also consider the effects lower salaries could have upon its greatest population, undergraduate students.

"If they want the best students to come here, they need to take into consideration that they need to attract the best instructors," Gaw said.

Student organization offers origami lessons on campus

By NANCY FOSTER
Kansas State Collegian

Looking down at his paper, Ross Flanner smiled as his origami shape came to life.

What came to life was a crane, and his second creation, a candy box.

"I find it relaxing," Flanner, Manhattan resident, said. "It's kind of a challenge, kind of like puzzles. There's something satisfying about getting to the finish."

Flanner participated in an origami lesson presented Thursday night by the KSU Japanese Appreciation Alliance.

PHOTOS BY STEVEN DEARINGER/Collegian

Ross Flanner, Manhattan resident, works on a crane Wednesday night during a presentation by the KSU Japanese Appreciation Alliance in Waters Hall. Flanner said he had a interest in doing origami since he was a child.

"I've had an interest in origami for a long time," Flanner said. "Since I was a kid, we had a couple of origami books and I always wanted to get better at it."

Learning to make the tiny folds and creases could have been more difficult if not for one thing, Flanner said.

"I had a personal assistant the whole time, so that made it a lot easier," he said, "Doing it alone without much help, it's more of a struggle."

Chris Rea, sophomore in psychology, gets help folding his candy box from Kaori Mori, exchange student in English language program, during the origami presentation Thursday night in Waters Hall.

Members of the organization walked around the room, helping each of the participants.

"They had a lot of people helping. I looked around the room and noticed other people were getting help, too," Flanner said.

Flanner heard about the lesson through his roommate, Kai Kaneshiro, who wanted Flanner to go with him to the event.

"I've been doing origami for two years now," Kaneshiro, Manhattan resident, said. "When I saw the ad, I thought it was interesting someone put on a presentation on it."

He said not only was he interested in the origami, but that he supports any diversity program.

"I'm part Japanese, so it's been a part of my culture," Kaneshiro said. "Two years ago, I found some books on advanced origami — some difficult shapes — so I've gotten into that stuff."

Kaneshiro said even though he already knew the basics, he still found it interesting.

"It's nice to know there's an organization on campus interested in Japanese culture, and putting together different events in that," he said.

Being part of the Japanese culture was one aspect the presenter, Vicki Martinson, discussed during her demonstration. She gave the history of origami — how it originated in China and is now a part of life in many countries, including the United States

"Origami has been appreciated as an art, but it's more than just folding," she said.

Martinson told the class how origami can be used in many professions, such as teaching.

"Many therapists also use origami," she said. "It's a great stress reliever."

Those who have arthritis can do finger exercises to help their condition, she said.

"The benefits gained from origami are very valuable," Martinson said.

Muidy Man, an exchange student from Korea, said because of where she was from, she was especially interested in learning the origami tradition.

"I think it's good to know more about other countries and their traditions," she said.

Chris Ren, sophomore in psychology, said the knowledge gained from the lesson might be helpful in his career.

"Maybe if I end up in child psychology, it'd be a good way to loosen the kids up," he said.

Ren said he had never done origami before, but that he had a lot of fun trying it.

"The only reason it was hard was because I couldn't see what she was doing, but other than that, it wasn't very hard," he said.

Flanner said he liked the presentation, and the packets that were handed to everyone there, which included different folding techniques and facts about origami and its origin.

"I like that they have more stuff in here to take home," he said. "I am hoping to see what else the JAA does — what other presentations they do."

Tuberculosis outbreak at KSU spurs mandatory testing

By BRYAN SCRIBNER
Kansas State Collegian

A university policy mandating tuberculosis testing for some students could be adopted in January.

Dr. Earl Reppert, medical director for Lafene Health Center, said testing would be required for students that have visited or resided in countries at risk for the disease. He said these students would not be permitted to register at K-State until tested.

There are 1,016 K-State students from countries outside of the United States, Reppert said. About 950 of these students are from countries at risk for tuberculosis. Only 27 countries are not high-risk areas.

Reppert said about 40 percent of the students who have visited or lived in a high-risk country could carry the disease.

"Students from other countries have an increased risk, but the chances of them having tuberculosis or spreading it is very low," he said.

The Tuberculosis Prevention Program Policy would require skin testing for students who might have been exposed to the disease. Students taking part in a university-sponsored study abroad program must have resided in the country for four to six months.

Reppert said the latent form of the disease is harmless and not contagious. The active form is contagious and, if not treated, can cause death. Constant contact with an active carrier is required to contract tuberculosis.

The skin test injects a small amount of tuberculosis protein under the skin. If the patient is a carrier, a visible reaction to the protein will develop. A chest X-ray then identifies if the disease is active or latent.

The X-ray would be required if a skin test is positive. Each X-ray would cost $45, but health insurance could cover the bill, Reppert said. If the X-ray indicates latent tuberculosis, this would be the only cost of treatment. Medication is free and the policy will not raise student privilege fees.

The disease can be treated in both of its forms. Reppert said multiple drugs must be taken for a period of about six months. No effective vaccine exists.

K-State is the last university in the Big 12 to adopt a mandatory policy. Reppert said that in the past six years there have been two cases of active tuberculosis at the university. The disease was not spread to others on campus.

Dustin Petrik, student representative of the communicable disease committee, said the new policy might help eliminate possible outbreaks. Without preventative efforts, he said the university could be liable if the disease became a problem on campus.

"Other schools are doing it and we're not," he said. "We're eliminating a problem before it happens."

Pat Bosco, dean of student life, said a committee has been researching the policy for about five months.

Sunset Zoo to be site of weekend trick-or-treating Children of all ages can visit the Sunset Zoological Park this weekend to begin trick-or-treating.

Eileen Bauer, director of marketing and development, said she expects more than 2,000 children to attend Spooktacular either from 4 to 7 p.m. Saturday or 1 to 4 p.m. Sunday.

About 30 businesses also will be on site, handing out candy, including Mr. P's Party Outlet, McDonald's, Manhattan/Ogden USD 383 and Big Brothers/Big Sisters of Manhattan.

There are three trails with candy stops and games along the way, Bauer said.

Those in attendance can participate in costume contests, including creative animal costume, most creative non-animal costume, scariest animal costume and scariest non-animal costume. Contests will be in the Chautauqua Amphitheater.

To be eligible to collect candy, each child must pay $3 at the door, which will allow their parents to enter free of charge.

Wichita police detective charged with felony theft

WICHITA — A Wichita police detective has been charged with felony theft for allegedly stealing funds from an insurance and financial services company.

Detective Suzette C. Manuel is accused of stealing by deception $3,031 from USAA of San Antonio, Texas. Officials with USAA and the police department would not elaborate on the charges.

Manuel's attorney, Les Hulnick, also declined comment. A preliminary hearing is set for Nov. 1.

Police Chief Norman Williams said the detective had been suspended without pay. Manuel is an 8-year veteran, whose duties have included theft investigations, background checks on police officer applicants and the sex-crimes unit.

Williams said it was extremely unusual for someone in the department to face a felony charge. He said investigating the case was a matter of preserving public trust.

"We received information, we followed up on it and we presented the facts to the DA," Williams said.

He said the charge against Manuel should not be seen as tarnishing the image of the police department, which has about 634 commissioned members.

PlayStation 2 in demand as early Christmas gift

NEW YORK — For customers trying to get their hands on a Sony PlayStation2, it didn't pay to be polite.

Around the country, shoppers resorted to whatever tactics were necessary to get one of the video-game consoles when they went on sale before daybreak Thursday. In some cases, that meant picking fights with security guards or pushing their way to the front of the line at 3 a.m.

The reason for the pushing and shoving: Sony has said it cannot meet customer demand for the PlayStation2 because of parts shortages.

Thousands of people, from hard-core gamers in their 20s and 30s to grandparents looking to buy PlayStation2 for their grandchildren, went home empty-handed — and angry.

Scuffles even broke out at some places.

In Minot, N.D., police were called to a Wal-Mart after receiving reports of people threatening others in line. In Woodstock, Ga., two eager customers were ticketed for disorderly conduct as they waited to buy the PlayStation2 at a Wal-Mart.

Some stores had midnight openings, inviting those who had ordered their consoles in advance. Other stores issued tickets for those in line before the doors opened to prevent a stampede.

"We are trying to create harmony," said James Reyes, 30, who waited all night outside the Circuit City store on Manhattan's Upper East Side, despite being hobbled by a broken leg. "A few of us got together and organized a very tight line."

PlayStation2 is part of a new generation of consoles that eventually will allow people to watch DVD movies, download music, play games with their friends in another city, and do some surfing — all through their TV sets.

Because of a parts shortage, Sony cut in half to 500,000 the number of consoles it planned to provide to stores on the launch date.

Sony said it is on target to deliver a total of 1.3 million PlayStation2's in North America by Christmas, but that probably is not going to be enough to meet demand.

Many shoppers turned to the Internet, where by early afternoon, more than 300 PlayStation2's were for sale on eBay. Some bids topped $800.

Scalpers also were seen trying to sell PlayStation 2 consoles for $1,500 on Manhattan's Upper East Side.

Allocating funds topic at Senate

By BRYAN SCRIBNER
Kansas State Collegian

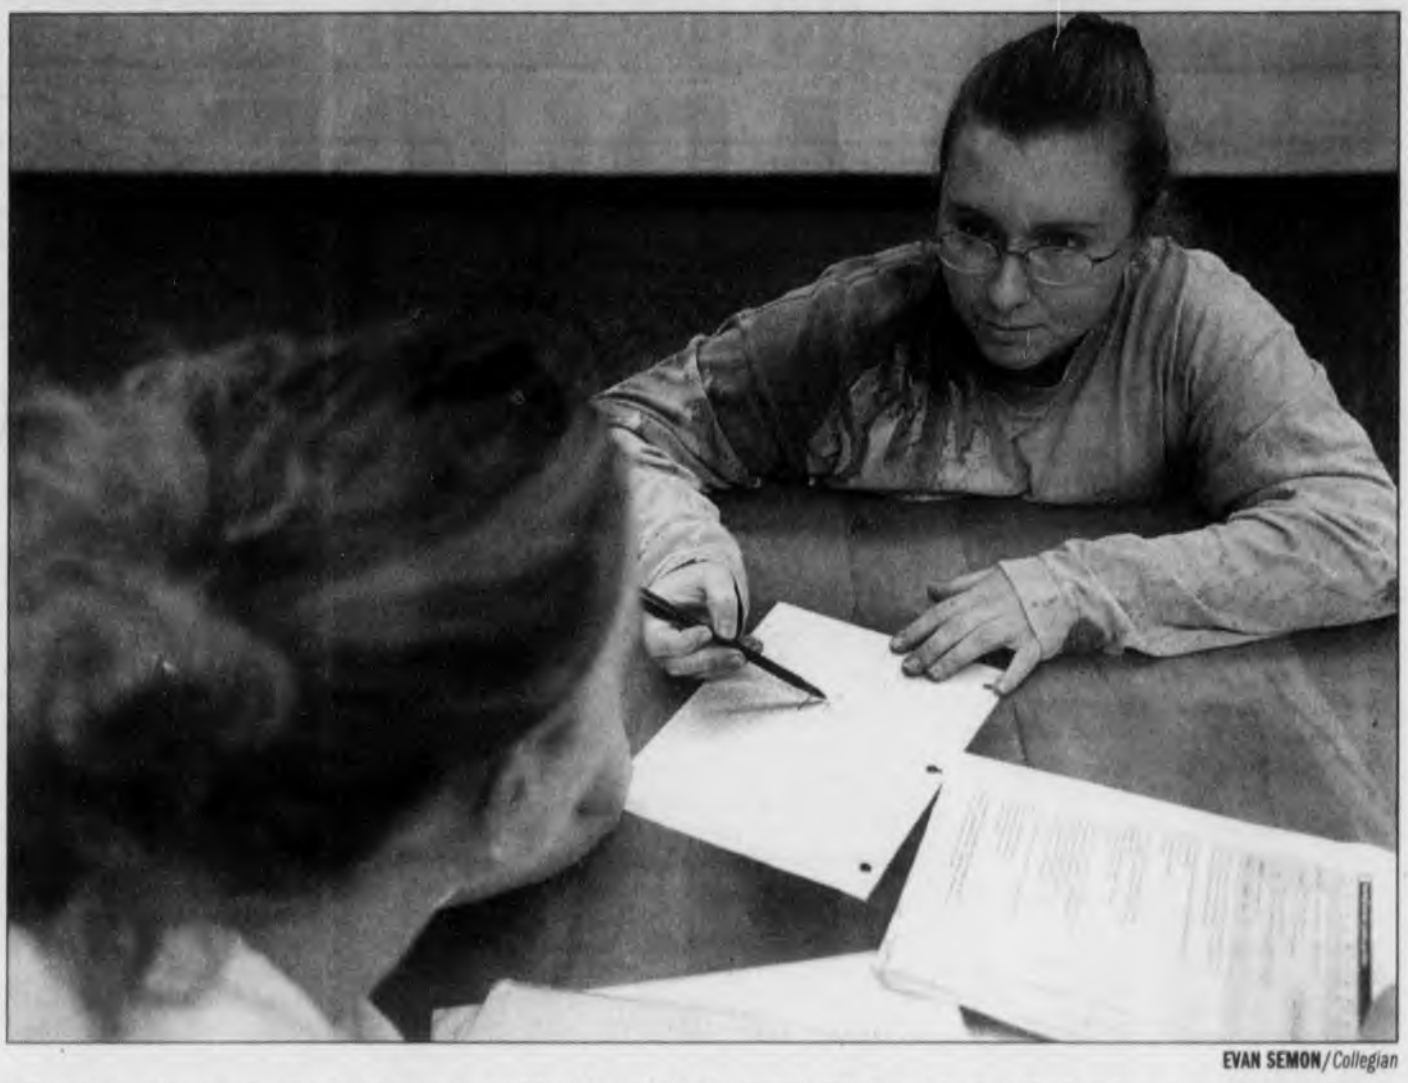
An allocation that funds unrepresented groups on campus was introduced at Thursday's Student Senate meeting.

The Educational Opportunity Fund allots money for scholarships, salaries, graduate positions and disabled student groups, Dustin Petrik, Senate chief of staff, said. Its budget assists 27 campus organizations.

The fund was established in 1988 by the Kansas Board of Regents, and it is funded by privilege fees.

Increased tuition and remaining funds from last year allowed the opportunity fund's committee to spend an additional $9,020. The committee allotted a total of $247,593.

Organizations that fund graduate teaching assistants received an increased allocation of $500, Petrik said.



Student Body Vice President Dana Pracht said the 27 organizations that applied for the funding will receive it in the fiscal year 2002. She said funding guidelines set by the regents were followed, and proposals and organizations' past spending habits were reviewed.

"It's a really interesting program and possibly one of the greatest things I enjoy in this position," Pracht said.

Residence hall tutors give academic assistance in study-group settings, earn spending money

By ALYSON RALETZ
Kansas State Collegian

EVAN SEMON/Collegian

Catherine Cleavinger, sophomore in architecture, works as a tutor at Derby Academic Resource Center. Cleavinger works about five hours a week at $6 an hour. She said she receives $9 an hour if more than five students attend, which rarely happens.

Asking help from a tutor is not the worst thing in the world, said Cathrine Cleavinger, a tutor at the Derby Academic Resource Center.

"Students think if they go to a tutoring session, people will think they are stupid. That is not the case," Cleavinger, sophomore in architecture, said.

Cleavinger does not deal primarily with one-on-one interaction with students, but instead leads group study sessions at the DARC and the Academic Resource Center of Kramer.

She said she works about five hours a week at $6 an hour. She said she receives $9 an hour if more than five students attend, but that rarely happens.

Matthew Brown, coordinator of Academic Affairs for the Department of Housing and Dining Services, said being a tutor in the residence halls offers a convenient location for a job.

"Also, many students are majoring in the field of subjects they tutor," Brown said. "It helps them to get a better grasp on their own subject. You don't know something until you teach it."

Cleavinger said she started tutoring because she wanted to help the first-year architecture students with Descriptive Physics, a class she had to take for her major. Those study sessions will be offered next semester.

"I was doing well, but many of my classmates were not doing well at all," she said. "I spent a lot of time helping them outside of class. Next semester, I want to make sure first-year architecture students do not have to go through what my classmates went through."

Cleavinger leads sessions in Macroeconomics and Physical World.

She said she has had problems with English and has received tutoring. She said while she was in high school she received extra help from an English teacher.

The teacher made the subject easy for her to understand through her simple language, she said. Cleavinger said this reflects in her own tutoring style.

"I like to think that I communicate well," she said. "I don't have a large vocabulary, so not knowing those big words that confuse students helps me not to use them."

Kassie Inness, freshman in architecture, said she attended one of Cleavinger's Macroeconomics sessions because she realized she did not understand anything that was being taught in her class.

"I went to the DARC because I knew I was struggling," Inness said. "I knew I needed to buckle down and do something about it. I will definitely come back for another session because it gave me a better understanding of the material."

Inness said she liked Cleavinger's tutoring style because she wrote things down and taught concepts visually.

"I like to draw things," Cleavinger said. "I draw little cars when I am talking about velocity and acceleration in Physical World, and I draw graphs and charts for Macroeconomics. I try to make things visual because I am a visual person."

Cleavinger said one of her greatest fears is whether she really helps people.

"There are lots of people that come in here once or twice," she said. "I wonder if I really help people. I wonder if they just put up with me for an hour, leave and never want to come back."

On the other hand, she said she has had some positive experiences.

She once tutored a student in fear of failing.

"He actually made the effort to come," she said. "I had to give him props for that. People that get F's don't usually come, because they don't care."

She said after his next test, he came back and had done better on his test.

"That was so cool," she said. "I actually did something right."

Brown said he agreed that students who are doing poorly are not the students he sees get tutors.

"It is my perception that they are generally B students trying to get an A," he said. "Students who are struggling don't tend to show up."

Brown said students think tutoring is a good idea for other people, not themselves.

"Students think you don't need a tutor until it's too late," he said. "They think tutoring is a quick fix, but it's not. You can't go to one session and get an A in the class."

GTAs deserve salaries on par with their peers

In 1998, K-State was last in terms of the median salary scale of Big 12 graduate teaching assistants.

We would like to give you more updated information, but we cannot. Even with an open-records policy, more current information was said to not be available.

In 1998, the Big 12 median GTA salary was $10,206, excluding the average K-State GTA salary being added. When K-State's salary was added, there was a declination in the number, it fell to $9,969.

This is ridiculous.

The university needs to stop focusing so hard on getting students to come here and instead divert a large portion of that attention on keeping its current students satisfied.

GTAs have an effect on student's knowledge. They teach a lot of our important classes and are essential to the learning environment for undergraduates. Yet they have little to show for it.

Last year, the professors finally were given a 5.9 percent raise after years of lagging behind others in the Big 12.

Now it is time for the GTAs of K-State to get the respect, thus the raise, that they deserve.

After all, the university prides itself on a lot of things related to academics, for instance the top scholarships and students who win various competitions and events. Yet that pride is lacking in terms of paying GTAs.

We, the students, deserve to have quality teaching assistants. That is going to be next to impossible if they don't start getting what they deserve — a salary increase.

Worcester and Pracht, what happened to unreasonable fee increases?

Yeah, my grandma has zero to five drinks for breakfast. Come on, students.

Can we put some men's restrooms in Seaton Hall, please?

It's nice to know that I finally made the paper — in the police reports.

Why is it that national news media is so pro-Gore?

Just because SGA wants to do something during their term doesn't mean that students have to finance a worthless activity center.

No justice in ABUSE

Children deserve our protection

KELLIE FARRELL/ Collegian

ERIN SCHNEWEIS

Children are gifts from heaven, yet sometimes they are treated in conditions that one would associate with hell.

It is a shame.

Mary Bass of Missouri recently was convicted of the murder of her two 8-year-old sons. The murder took place a year ago this month, but she tortured them long before she killed them. She withheld food and burned their legs with scalding water. She treated them as if they weren't humans.

Teachers noticed and took action — but there is only so much they could do. According to the Kansas City Star, they called the Division of Family Services as early as 1995. An internal investigation found the staff members of these services failed to properly review prior reports; thus, they didn't see the patterns of abuse.

If they had, maybe the boys would be alive.

Unfortunately, this is not the only case. It will happen again. According to the Web site preventchildabuse.com, in 1997 more than three million children were reported for child abuse and neglect to the child protective services in the United States.

Keep in mind the word "reported." Reported does not mean saved, and it sure as hell doesn't even reflect on how many children actually are victimized.

Steps have been taken to ensure a similar incident will not happen in Jackson County. Steps such as the hotline workers and the staff members undergoing more training, eight new chief investigators being added on, and there will be more social workers placed in area schools.

A bill has been signed into law that strengthens Missouri's child-protection system, which requires immediate communication between law enforcement and these family services.

But that is in Missouri.

What about here in Kansas?

In 1998, in the land of the yellow-brick road, there were 39,642 cases of reported child abuse and neglect according to Dianne Sloan, prevention of early intervention specialist at the Kansas Children's Service League. Sloan said of those cases, 6,790 were substantial, thus proven true.

When someone suspects abuse or neglect, they can call the Central Child Abuse and Neglect Hotline. There the informant will be asked a series of questions, such as why they believe the abuse is occurring, the address of the victim, the situation, if they want to remain anonymous or report their name. Another question is if the child is in danger at the current time, or did the incident(s) occur previously?

Sloan said there is a 20-day deadline after this call for the start of their investigation, they determine if the abuse actually occurred.

Sometimes the reports are bogus. Bogus reports can stem from occasional custody battles to angry neighbors looking for revenge.

The bogus reports are taking the energy, time and funds away from the children who really need assistance.

Unfortunately, no matter how many laws and programs are established or improved there will continue to be sexual, mental, emotional and physical abuse.

A portion of children will still be neglected, and a number of parents will still be cruel, like John and Carrie Davis of Wonder Valley, Calif., who have been held with a $2 million bail on a charge of torture of their two developmentally retarded boys. The parents allegedly refused to feed the boys. Not only were the boys undernourished, but they also were chained, forced to use an outhouse and not allowed to bathe.

If people are so heartless and cold, they are going to harm their children no matter what the circumstances.

Idealistically, there are some things we can do to stop this from happening so frequently. According to the Web site preventchildabuse.com, we can write our candidates and elected officials asking them to support the One Percent to Prevent plan. This plan calls for spending one percent of our budget surplus on child abuse prevention programs.

We can look for the warning signs that children who are abused usually exhibit. The warning signs are behaviors such as aggression towards their peers or adults, an inability to stay awake or to concentrate for extended periods, sudden dramatic changes in personality, showing an unnatural interest in sex; frequent or unexplained bruises or injuries; low self-esteem and poor hygiene.

If you want to become more informed on the issue through a first-hand child abuse story, read Dave Pelzer's "A Child Called 'It.'" This phenomenal book is less than 200 pages. It shows that it does pay to become involved in helping a child become free from abuse.

Innocent children are dying because of actions they cannot prevent or control. As one of the Davis case investigators, Sgt. Fred Gonzalez, said, "It makes me feel quite sad when you think that animals treat their young better than this."

Life becomes hectic as graduation nears

JOSEPH HURLA

Time goes at a different speed once graduation is less than a semester away.

Weeks still have seven days, but pages on the calendar are torn off at a mind-numbing pace. Days still have 24 hours, but the clock spins infinitely faster than it once did. Each morning when I wake up, I am years closer to being done with college. Graduation lies just around the corner, gaining speed as it hurdles ever nearer at exponentially increasing rates.

With time disappearing faster than ever before, it is impossible to accomplish all that remains undone.

Making good on years of promises to bring siblings for a visit, finally putting in a few hours of community service and making the trek to see Sunset Zoological Park quickly get swept under the rug when I realize that my journey into the so-called real world is only weeks away.

Instead, it is time to focus on the issues.

Where will I work?

Where will I live?

How will I eat?

I don't know when it was that finally realized I would not be able to continue to get jobs on a semester-by-semester basis. This has worked wonderfully during my years in college, but making a shade over minimum wage while running a cash register, mowing grass, building houses or making copies is not what I had in mind as a long-term goal when I decided to shell out $30,000 or $40,000 to go to K-State.

Regardless of when the realization struck me, I now realize my next job probably won't end on the Friday before the next final's week. It won't be a job — it will be a career.

Not only will my next employment be more sustained, it will not be within the security of Manhattan. Manhattan, as most everyone here realizes, is not a typical city. It is fairly small. It is not very diverse. A disproportionate percentage of the population is composed of other college students.

My next job won't be like that. I will be away from the comfort zone this homogeneous population provides. I will work with people from around the country and the world on more pressing issues than whether fountain drinks are on sale this week.

Well, I hope.

The fact is, like many students staring the monster that is post-graduation in the eye, I am unarmed.

That is, unemployed.

Sure, there are many attractive opportunities I would love to have a chance at. I have surfed the Web, signed up with Career and Employment Services, talked to my adviser and checked out the journalism job board.

But, like so many others, I still don't have a paycheck waiting to be dropped in the mail the second I snatch my diploma Dec. 9.

This is why there are going to be a lot of stressed seniors on campus for the remainder of the semester. Then next semester. Then the semester after that.

It is impossible to be prepared for your final semester. Sure, some lucky people are going to make a great connection and have a job lined up for them long before crunch time approaches. But many others are going to watch crunch time come and go before finally settling on a third-or fourth-choice job.

Many people are going to face the harsh reality that they will not be able to get that dream job with that dream salary. The Career and Employment Services Web page has a partial list of salaries offered to students who graduated in December 1999. Some salaries reach above $60,000. Others reach the other direction, as low as $12,000.

You can do the math, but $12,000 is not too far above minimum wage at 40 hours per week.

I don't want to be the next student to leave K-State the same way I spent my time here — broke.

So I will speed up.

I will find more possibilities.

I will send out more résumés.

I will make more phone calls.

And I will keep my fingers crossed.

Jeff Peterson correct choice for Manhattan for re-election

Editor,

Experience counts.

That's why Jeff Peterson is the obvious choice for re-election Nov. 7.

A gifted legislator and tireless advocate for Manhattan and K-State, Jeff has built a solid reputation for common sense while working to represent the 66th District.

Despite political claims to the contrary, Peterson has been a champion for public employees. He has supported the KPERS program and used his seat on the House Appropriations Committee to make responsible budget decisions.

Peterson's experiences as a former student body president make him the perfect choice to help build support for K-State in Topeka. He supported the recent reforms in higher education – and the requisite funding for implementation and improvements to faculty salaries.

Perhaps most importantly, Peterson has spent the past four years working to strengthen his already deep ties to the Manhattan community. He understands the needs and concerns of his constituents, but he also has a working knowledge of how to get things done in the Statehouse – a distinct advantage over his opponent.

Jeff Peterson has served Manhattan residents and K-State students well.

Voters would be remiss not to return him to Topeka.

SGA-proposed activity center unneeded, outdated solution

Editor,

I am writing with concerns about the planned student activity center proposed by the Student Senate. Do we really need it? I understand the idea of giving every campus organization their own desk, phone and possible computer as stated in an Oct. 24 Manhattan Mercury article, but come on — is this being realistic?

First, how many of these groups are willing, let alone able, to have someone sit at that desk and wait for the off chance that someone might drop by or call?

As for club meeting space, I have not heard a single club complain because they could not find a place to meet. There are plenty of empty classrooms in the evening and conference rooms available.

I also am having a problem with comments that this center would bring the greek community and the independents closer together. If this truly was an aim, maybe the greeks would like to invite the various apartment complexes and other off-campus dwellers to participate in activities such as homecoming float building or other activities that involve the greeks and the residence halls.

What all this boils down to is we are going to spend $4.8 million on an area for clubs to hang out in and try and make more people aware of their existence.

My answer to this is a simple "wake up and smell the information age." What we really need is a better Web site for the various clubs and organizations. The one we have now, to say quite bluntly, sucks. There are clubs listed that no longer exist and often the contact information is out of date for the clubs that still are in operation.

The Web site that I envision would only cost at most around $3,000 for the computer and a little effort on the part of the various clubs and organizations to put up their own Web page. The URL for this site could be something such as organizations.ksu.edu, and the subsequent club pages could be listed like organizations.ksu.edu/campuscatbackers.

The point I am trying to make is that we are wasting $4.8 million on a project that is not needed. The resources already exist to give these organizations a home where they can be reached 24 hours a day, seven days a week.

Sure, Student Senate won't be able to pat themselves on the back for creating a new way to rob students of more cash or bloat their résumés, but it just makes sense not to spend this money when there are other areas that need it more, such as parking and the library. Let's put out these fires first before we rush in and decide to start new ones.

SGA site rebuilt to be functional

By JESSICA LEDUC
Kansas State Collegian

The Student Governing Association has a little known tool for students, and it is just a mouse click away.

The redesigned SGA Web page, at www.ksu.edu/osas/sga, is now up and running.

"A lot of people don't even know about it," Ted Conrad, senior in finance, said. "This year, a lot of changes have been made to the page."

Student Senate Chair Travis Lenkner, senior in print journalism and pre-law, said the newly designed page offers visitors more information than in the past.

"The old page was not very functional. It only gave the basic information," Lenkner said. "This page is more of a tool for students."

Conrad said that SGA members are working hard this year to keep the page updated.

The Web page is updated weekly with the latest legislation that the Senate is considering for that week. It also includes minutes from the previous meetings. On Wednesday, the agenda for the Thursday Senate meeting is posted.

"The page is a tool for Senate and SGA members so they can check out the agenda," Conrad said. "They can see the entire agenda before the meetings without having to go to the Office of Student Activities and Services."

"This is a communication tool that the entire student body can use. These comments can be forwarded to the entire SGA Listserv."

– Ted Conrad
senior in finance

The SGA page also can be an important research tool for students. Lenkner said the page will give students an opportunity to view past legislation and what has been done on past issues.

In the past two weeks, budget forms have been posted on the site. These forms are for student organizations on campus requesting money. Groups can fill out the forms online, print them off and turn them into the OSAS.

"These forms increase awareness," Conrad said. "And they are convenient; people can fill them out whenever they want to."

The SGA Web site also will be a valuable tool for those running for an office in the spring. The site includes a link to an election packet, which includes an application, complete instructions for candidates, a timetable for elections and campaign rules. All of these forms also are available at OSAS.

"This will be valuable to everyone in SGA who is running for re-election, and for the students wanting to run for office," Conrad said.

Conrad said visitors to the Web site also can leave comments or ideas for improvements on the page.

"This is a communication tool that the entire student body can use," he said. "These comments can be forwarded to the entire SGA Listserv."

Also on the Web page are the complete constitution and by-laws for SGA, a complete Senate roster and each senator's e-mail address. Links also are available to learn more about the three branches of the student government — executive, legislative and judicial.

Now that the SGA Web page is up and running, students can visit at any time and learn more about what student government on campus is doing on campus.

"Students will now have a resource that is always available to them," Lenkner said.

Club figures student price index

By APRIL MIDDLETON
Kansas State Collegian

Students now have legitimate evidence to give to their parents when they call home requesting that money be transferred to their dwindling checking accounts.

Students' costs are on the rise.

The Economics Club at K-State has created a student price index, a student version of the consumer price index.

The CPI is an inflation indicator which charts the costs of the goods consumers buy. The CPI includes costs of insurance, medicine, furniture and other consumer goods.

However, according to club president Ben Baffa, many of the goods presented in the CPI don't affect students.

The SPI eliminates those goods and focuses on those that do, such as pizza, fuel, groceries, textbooks, tuition, rent and beer.

"The SPI is specifically tailored to track those items that students consume," Baffa said. "All the prices are obtained locally, so students can actually see where the bulk of their money is going."

Baffa said students always have been conscious of prices and what they are spending, but now they can compare their costs to those nationwide.

The SPI for September showed that the costs of favorite student products had risen 1.3 percent above the August figure. The CPI, however, charted only an increase of 0.5 percent.

Baffa said the rise in the SPI was greatly influenced by the recent rise of movie tickets from $6.50 to $6.75.

"Over one month changes like this have a significant impact," he said. "But if you look at the data for a year's time, the impact isn't so great. That is where our index will have a closer correlation with the CPI."

Club adviser Michael Oldfather came up with the idea for the SPI as a way to give students more experience.

"It's great experience for the students to get," Oldfather said. "They are gaining useful knowledge and experience doing the same things that economists strive to understand."

Oldfather said the club was interested in seeing how students' costs compared to other consumers.

The club hopes to release SPI figures every month to coincide with the release of the nationally released CPI.

The Texas A&M football team rushes the football field as K-State free safety Lamar Chapman hits the ground, dejected, after Texas A&M's Sirr Parker scored the winning touchdown in double overtime Dec. 5, 1998 as part of the Dr Pepper Big 12 Football Championship Game in St. Louis. K-State was defeated 36-33. This weekend, K-State gets the chance to redeem the loss at 2:30 p.m. in College Station.

Dec. 3, 1998.

A dark, overcast shadow hovered over the RCA Dome in St. Louis, Mo., as Texas A&M's Sirr Parker desperately reached across the goal line.

Hopes and dreams of an undefeated season, not to mention a national championship, seemed to hang in the balance as K-State awaited a signal from the line judge.

Touchdown Aggies

The No. 2 Wildcats, on the brink of a bid for the national title game, were stunned 36-33 in double overtime — a come-from-behind victory by No. 10 Texas A&M.

"That game is still heartbreaking," senior strong safety Jarrod Cooper said. "We were just seconds away, and all we had to do was stop it, and we were going ... but that's all right. We'll just use it as motivation, if anything."

That motivation will come into play Saturday, as No. 10/8 K-State travels to College Station, Texas, to meet the unranked Aggies, marking the first time the two programs have faced since the Cats' loss in '98.

And don't think the Wildcats easily forgot that game, or the following 37-34 loss to Purdue in the Alamo Bowl, senior defensive end Chris Johnson said.

"After we lost the bowl game, too, everybody was saying we couldn't bounce back after a big game. Through that whole summer, you kept hearing about it and hearing about it," he said.

"You'd see all these T-shirts, 'Remember the Alamo,' and everything seemed to remind you of that Big 12 Championship. But I think we've put it in the past — we had to so we could move on. We really haven't thought about it since then."

However, head coach coach Bill Snyder said the feelings associated with the A&M defeat still might be lingering in the players' minds.

"I think basically from a business-at-hand approach, you look at how you need to prepare for this particular ball game," he said. "Does the emotion of the loss in '98 have an impact? Maybe, to a certain degree."

Yet, Snyder said he knows as a coach that he can't dwell on such a disappointing game.

"I'm not satisfied with the fact that we lost the ball game, quite obviously, but I think it's

Kyle Field renowned for noise, distractions

By MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

When K-State takes the field against Texas A&M on Saturday, it won't be playing in just any stadium.

Kyle Field, an arena so beloved by its fans that it actually has its own Web site, is home to fans so loud and spirited that they are known as "The Twelfth Man."

However, the moniker given to the fans is, in fact, more like the "The 80,000th Man," as College Station's colossal stadium is regularly filled. Against the University of Texas last year, the Aggies set an attendance record of 80,200.

And those 80,200 fans made a lot of noise, said K-State strong safety Jarrod Cooper, who attended the game with offensive lineman Milford Stephenson.

"My god, it was terrorizingly loud," he said.

That noise will pose problems for the K-State offense, which relies heavily on quarterback Jonathan Beasley's ability to audible at the line. The solution to that problem — prepare to do a lot of yelling, said Beasley, who has played at Kyle Field before.

In 1996, the last time K-State played at College Station, Beasley substituted for quarterback Brian Kavanagh.

"When I went down there my freshman year, I couldn't even hear myself talk in the huddle," Beasley said. "I went in for one play when Kav got kind of woozy, so I know it's going to be loud. I'll probably have to pack a couple of throat lozenges before the game."

Regardless of Beasley's lung power, however, he'll still have a difficult time communicating the audibles to even the offensive line, which stands right in front of him, left guard Andy Eby said.

"We try to block out the noise, but sometimes it's a little too hard," he said. "Trying to get checks sometimes is a little bit harder, so it's just really important this week that we work on communicating along the line."

So if Beasley can't yell the plays to the linemen, he has only one option — assume the position.

"Sometimes I might be down in a three-point stance with the linemen trying to give them the audible so they can hear it," Beasley said.

As for the rest of the players on the offense, they will learn the plays via Beasley hand signals.

Regardless, though, the best way to deal with the noise is to silence the crowd with a big play, defensive end Chris Johnson said.

"When I went down there my freshman year, I couldn't even hear myself talk in the huddle ... I'll probably have to pack a couple of throat lozenges before the game."

— Jonathan Beasley

"That's what we want to do as a defense, as well as the offense. We want to take them out of their game," he said, "and what better place to do it than in front of their own stadium."

While the deafening noise certainly is an area of concern, K-State has overcome loud environments before, running backs coach Michael Smith said.

"We've been in hostile environments and our kids have responded well and done a good job with it, so I don't think it should be a distraction," he said.

Part of the reason that K-State expects to handle the noise is because many K-State players are more excited than intimidated, Eby said.

"They say it's the loudest stadium that they've ever played in, so I think it's going to be kind of fun, kind of exciting," he said. "It's going to pump you up a little bit, playing in front of all those people and playing in front of that loudness."

There's also the fact that by booing the Cats, the Aggie fans actually will be cheering on at least one member of the K-State defense.

"I like it because whenever they boo, I always think they're just saying Coop," the senior captain said. "So every time we go somewhere and they're booing, I'm just imagining that they're saying my name — so it just gets me fired up. And I like loud noise. Our whole defense, we function good on loud noise."

Of course, in addition to noise levels, the Aggie fans also have well-known traditions such as chants and a sway, where every fan moves back and forth together in unison.

However, their most famous tradition, and Cooper's favorite, is kissing one's date after an Aggie Touchdown. That's something Cooper said he can appreciate.

"If they score a touchdown, I'm running in the stands to get a kiss from somebody," he said.

QUICK FACTS

- K-State has won 60 consecutive regular-season games against unranked opponents regardless of venue, with the last loss on Nov. 6, 1993, at Iowa State (27-23).
- The Wildcats are one of only six Division I teams with at least seven wins at this point in the season, including one of 21 teams in the nation with no more than one loss.
- Texas A&M has compiled a 63-6-1 record at Kyle Field during R.C. Slocum's 12-year tenure as head coach, including eight undefeated seasons at home. However, the Aggies already have lost a game in College Station this year, a 26-19 defeat to Colorado on Oct. 7.
- The Aggies are riding a two-game road winning streak heading into this weekend, posting a 24-0 shutout of Baylor and a 30-7 victory over Iowa State. The wins climbed Texas A&M into a a tie with Texas for second place in the Big 12 South behind undefeated Oklahoma.

Series history
Series – Tied 4-4
Streak – Texas A&M has won one
Last meeting – Texas A&M won 36-33, Dec. 5, 1998, in double overtime of the Big 12 Championship in St. Louis.

Wildcat injury update

Junior left guard Andy Eby, senior fullback Johnno Lazetich, senior tight end Shad Meier and freshman offensive lineman Nick Leckey are all on the injury list for Saturday's matchup with Texas A&M.

Head coach Bill Snyder said Lazetich (concussion) will not play versus the Aggies, while the statuses of both Meier (unspecified injury) and Leckey (leg) were uncertain as of Tuesday.

Meanwhile, Snyder said Eby (left elbow) is probable to make his return this weekend after missing the last two ball games against Oklahoma and Texas Tech.

"Andy, we anticipate at this point in time, would be available for the ball game," Snyder said Tuesday.

'Rocky Horror Picture Show' to show in Union for 11th year

By JJ DUNCAN
Kansas State Collegian

"The Rocky Horror Picture Show," the movie for everyone with a soft spot for transvestites from another planet, will make its 11th-annual showing at midnight Friday in the Union Main Ballroom.

The movie has become a cult classic and places two young lovers, played by Susan Sarandon and Barry Bostwick, in a castle on a dark and stormy night. They are at the mercy of a bizarre group of people with outlandish sexual tendencies, led by a mad scientist, Dr. Frank-N-Furter, played by Tim Curry.

For those who have never been to a showing of the film, there is just as much flagrancy within the audience as there is on the screen, Jennifer McDaneld, sophomore in human resources, said. Men often cross-dress, many people dress as characters in the movie and there are more than a few skimpy outfits, she said.

"One guy last year came dressed as Rocky in nothing but gold briefs and gold shoes," McDaneld said. "It took some guts to wear that, but he did have the body for it."

Admission is $4 per person, and festivities will begin at 11:30 p.m. with events including a costume contest. Upon admission, each person is given a bag of props to use throughout the movie such as toast and rice, said Tyler Adams, committee chair of Kaleidoscope Films.

The audience is encouraged to be loud and unruly throughout the show by the two masters of ceremonies and their group, who yell back at the screen and keep the energy up, Melanie Bean, junior in advertising, said.

Bean and Corbin Crable, senior in English, will be the masters of ceremonies this year, directing the action and letting the audience know when to use certain items in their bags.

"We have rice to throw during the wedding in the movie and a paper for when it's raining," Bean said. "We pick up some very interesting things after the show, like some condoms that were filled with an unidentified substance."

Such a big mess can take much work to clean up, which is why tarps are spread on the floor to speed up the cleaning process, which takes about an hour, Adams, junior in marketing, said.

"The tarps make it easier to pick up the rice and toast and all the other stuff people bring to the show," he said. "We have to be a little more strict on some things they might throw around though because we can't have the Union Ballroom demolished."

This year's production is special because it is the 25th anniversary of the release of the movie.

In honor of the anniversary, there will be prizes given out for the best imitation of a character from the movie. Also, the Pledge to Transsexual Transylvania, a tradition at K-State performances, will be performed.

Bean, who will be dressed in a cat suit, said she enjoys the idea of hosting the show because it gives her a chance to go nuts without people thinking any less of her.

"I get to be crazy and people do not judge me for it," she said. "I can express myself without any repercussions."

McDaneld, who will be dressed as Magenta, a character from the movie, said seeing the film at home on video proves just how bad the movie really is. It isn't until it is seen in a group of people who make fun of it and act with it that people understand how much fun "The Rocky Horror Picture Show" can be.

"People have to go with an open mind because it can really get crazy," she said. "There are going to be guys in corsets and girls dressed in skimpy outfits, and the intent is just to have fun. Don't take it too seriously."

Chilean-based ensemble to visit McCain as part of tour of North, Latin America

By DENISE GUTTERY
Kansas State Collegian

Using a blend of percussion, wind and string instruments, Inti-Illimani has played for the world for three decades.

As part of its American, Latin American and Canadian tour, the seven-member Chilean-based ensemble will perform at 8 tonight at McCain Auditorium.

Playing on more than 30 wind, string and percussion instruments, Thom Jackson, marketing and development officer for McCain Auditorium, said Inti-Illimani's compositions are a treasure for the human spirit.

"There are no vocals, but the music is very animated and they play so many unusual instruments the audience is going to be familiar with," Jackson said.

The synthesis of instrumentals captures sacred places, people's daily lives, loves and pains that weave an extraordinary cultural moral, he said.

"This is a very well-rounded performance that gets the audience involved," Jackson said. "You won't want to just sit and watch the performance. You will want to move to the music when you are listening to it."

Inti-Illimani met in the 1960s while studying engineering at Santiago Technical University.

After performing for 33 years, the group has released more than 30 albums, toured the country and been nominated for several awards.

TICKET INFO
Tickets are $20 for the general public, $18 for seniors and $10 for students. They can be ordered at the McCain Box Office or by calling 532-6428.

At the 1999 Entertainment Journalist Association Ceremony, Inti-Illimani was the most nominated artist and walked away with Best Album of the Year for La Rosa de los Vientos.

Jackson said the group's unique sound, forged with passion and poetry, became a symbol for peace in a world torn by turmoil. It has performed for Amnesty International with artists such as Sting, Bruce Springsteen, Wynton Marsalis and Peter Gabriel.

Richard Martin, director of McCain Auditorium, said Inti-Illimani's music, influenced by its numerous encounters with other cultures, has evolved with powerful poetry and provocative instrumental textures.

"The enthusiasm that they bring to their performances and the variety of music that is played, brings a musical aspect that is not used to being heard in Kansas," Martin said.

"We have been trying to get them here two years, and now we can give the students and public an opportunity to see a group that is considered to be among the very best in their field of music."

COURTESY PHOTO

Jackson said there are plenty of tickets left for the performance.

"It would be a shame if this wonderful opportunity to see such a great performance is not taken advantage of," he said.

Yankees celebrate World Series win

By BEN WALKER
The Associated Press

NEW YORK —The New York Yankees, thought to be too old and too banged-up to make it this far, became the first team in a quarter-century to win three straight World Series championships, beating the New York Mets 4-2 Thursday night.

Luis Sojo, one of many midseason pickups, hit a two-out, tiebreaking single off Al Leiter in the ninth inning to decide Game 5, stunning a Shea Stadium crowd that was sure there was more baseball to play.

The Subway Series turned out to be a short ride for New York fans who had waited 44 years for another one and hoped it would go seven games. Instead, the Yankees quickly matched the Oakland Athletics' three in a row from 1974 to '75 and won their fourth title in five years.

Only two other runs in baseball history can compare — Joe DiMaggio led the Yankees to five crowns from 1936-41, and Mickey Mantle helped take the Bronx Bombers to six titles from 1947-53.

While the lasting image of this Series is certain to be Roger Clemens throwing the bat at Mike Piazza, this is the picture the Yankees will prefer to savor: Owner George Steinbrenner hoisting another big piece of hardware for the team's trophy case.

Game 4 hero Derek Jeter, who earned his fourth ring at only 26, and slumping Bernie Williams homered for the Yankees. But it was Sojo, who blossomed into a good-luck charm after rejoining the Yanks from Pittsburgh on Aug. 7, who delivered the winning hit.

Leiter battled all night, and struck out the first two batters in the ninth. Then he walked Jorge Posada and gave up a single to Scott Brosius, and Sojo followed by slapping a single up the middle on Leiter's 142nd and final pitch. Another run scored on the play when center fielder Jay Payton's throw home hit Posada and bounded into the Mets dugout.

Leiter remained winless in 11 postseason starts, while Mike Stanton won in relief of Andy Pettitte. Mariano Rivera pitched the ninth for a save.

At the stroke of midnight, Piazza flied out to the edge of the warning track in center field with a runner on base to finish it.

The Yankees fans in the sellout crowd of 55,292 went wild after having been outshouted all evening.

Unlike the overmatched San Diego Padres in 1998 and the overwhelmed Atlanta Braves in 1999, the wild-card Mets were in it all the way. Their best chance, however, really may have ended when closer Armando Benitez could not hold a one-run lead in the opener.

These Yankees went into the playoffs with seven straight losses, and also dropped the opener in their AL series against Oakland and Seattle. In the end, though, manager Joe Torre's team showed what October experience is all about.

While Jeter and Williams hit the solo homers for the Yankees, the Mets scraped out two runs that left it tied at 2 through the seventh.

Williams put the Yankees ahead 1-0 when he homered leading off the second. The cleanup man had been 0-for-15 through four games and hitless in his last 22 Series at-bats overall.

Jeter, who homered on the first pitch of the game the previous night, made it 2-all by hitting a shot into the Yankees' left-field bullpen in the sixth off Leiter.

The Mets had to work much harder for their runs.

Bubba Trammell, starting because of his career success against Pettitte, walked with one out in the second and Payton singled. The runners moved up on a groundout and Leiter, an .053 hitter this season, dragged a perfect bunt past the mound.

First baseman Tino Martinez bobbled the ball for a moment and made an underhanded flip to Pettitte, but the pitcher dropped the throw. Pettitte was charged with an error — denying an RBI to Leiter, who had none this year — but a run scored and the Mets were satisfied.

Benny Agbayani followed with a slow roller that third baseman Brosius tried to play with his bare hand, but the ball escaped his grasp and went for an RBI single that gave the Mets a 2-1 lead.

Preliminary hearing postponed until next year in case involving KC barrel murders

The Associated Press

OLATHE, Kan. — The preliminary hearing on Kansas murder charges against John E. Robinson Sr., the man charged with killing women whose bodies were found in barrels last summer, has been postponed until next year.

The hearing, expected to last a week, had been scheduled to start Nov. 13 in Johnson County District Court. Defense attorneys citing a need for additional time to prepare their case had been granted one delay earlier, and another was approved Thursday by Judge John Anderson III.

Anderson, over the objection of District Attorney Paul Morrison, rescheduled the hearing for Feb. 5.

Robinson, 56, was arrested June 2 at his Olathe home on charges of aggravated sexual battery and felony theft in alleged assaults on two women he is reported to have met for sadomasochistic sex after contacting them on the Internet.

The investigation led to murder charges in the deaths of six women.

He is charged with two counts of capital murder in Kansas and three counts of first-degree murder in Missouri in the deaths of five women whose bodies were found in barrels in June. Two were on Robinson's property near La Cygne, Kan., three more in a storage locker in Raymore, Mo.

The Kansas capital murder charges involve the deaths of Suzette Marie Trouten, 28, of Newport, Mich., and Izabela Lewicka, a 22-year-old Polish immigrant.

Robinson also is charged in Kansas with one count of first-degree murder in the death of Lisa Stasi, who disappeared in 1985 and has never been found.

Robinson also is charged with aggravated interference with parental custody for allegedly taking Stasi's infant daughter, who was raised by a couple who might have unwittingly adopted the girl illegally.

Robinson is charged in Missouri with first-degree murder in the deaths of Sheila Faith and her daughter, Debbie, who were last seen in summer 1994 after moving to the area from Colorado, and Beverly Bonner, formerly of Cameron, Mo., who disappeared in 1994.

In seeking to delay the Kansas hearing, attorneys for the state's Death Penalty Defense Unit said they had received more than 11,000 pages of police reports from prosecutors and were expecting more.

Prosecutors replied that most of the reports had been turned over to the defense months ago and that some sat uncollected for several weeks after being made available. They said most of that material was not even required to be provided until after the preliminary hearing.

The state, which expects to call more than 60 witnesses at the hearing, vehemently opposed a delay.

It said many of the witnesses are from out of state and were uncooperative, so court orders had to be obtained to compel their testimony. Airline tickets for some witnesses already had been purchased, the state said.

REVENGE

important for me not to let baggage get in the way, so to speak," he said. "If I spend too much time focusing on that, I would certainly not be able to do justice to present-day preparation."

Nevertheless, Snyder said he and his staff can take positives from watching the tape of the Big 12 Championship against the Aggies.

"I think you've got to be at least semi-intelligent enough to view it a few times and make some determinations with where your weaknesses were and what you might do to circumvent them — how you might alter things that you do," Snyder said.

In any event, though, the important thing will be to concentrate and maintain a fixed mind on the Aggies this weekend, Johnson said, and not on anything that happened two years ago.

"That was in the past — we dealt with it then. It was hard at the time," he said, "but we've moved on and nobody really thinks about it a lot anymore. It has nothing to do with the road that we're trying to take right now.

"I think if we sit around and worry about what happened then, they already won. So we've got to focus on what we're trying to do now, and that's get back to the Big 12 Championship."

That goal, much like the Wildcats' national title aspirations in '98, are achievable, Johnson said, but this time K-State will have to prevent the Aggies from standing in their way.

"You don't want to play against ghosts and think about all the things that happened before. We've got to take care of business right now," Johnson said.

"I don't really think it's a revenge factor at all. That happened a couple years ago, so we know how it felt. We didn't like it very much, obviously, but this is a new team."

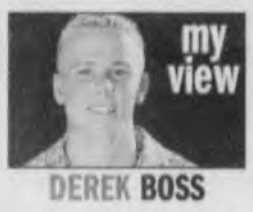
Junior captain and outside linebacker Ben Leber also said he felt the word "new" plays a vital role in keeping the Cats' minds off the '98 A&M loss.

"They have new personnel; we have new personnel," he said.

"Obviously, there are some guys on their team that were a part of it, like there are here, but I think they understand that it's a new season with new circumstances. So you can dwell on the fact of what happened two years ago."

Besides, Leber said he isn't worried about getting an eerie feeling playing against some of the same players that helped the Aggies knock off K-State in '98. In fact, he said he'd have a tough time recognizing any of them.

"I have such a poor memory. It could happen a week ago, and I still wouldn't remember their face or their name," Leber said.



Still, Beisel said the A&M loss could evoke a few recollections this Saturday.

"I don't think it'll play much of a factor, but you might get a little case of deja vu stepping on the field," he said. "I think that what happened two years ago was devastating for our program and our fans, but I think we've moved on, and hopefully we're going to go down there and compete and not hold any grudges."

As a result, Beisel said the team isn't necessarily making the trip to College Station with the feeling they have something to prove against the Aggies.

"I think that we've proven a lot to the country this season and the seasons past," he said. "It was just a heartbreaking defeat for us, but like I said, we've moved on. I'd like to think that what happened in the past doesn't affect what do on Saturday, so that's how I'm looking at it."

A&M defense, 12th Man areas of Cat focus

DEREK BOSS

They don't call 'em the Wrecking Crew for nothing.

Texas A&M and defense have a correlation like nothing else in college football, especially during R.C. Slocum's 12-year reign as head coach in College Station.

Even Bill Snyder knows it.

"When I was in the younger stages of my coaching career, I can always remember Texas A&M teams — they always talk about the Wrecking Crew and how they're known for playing very, very fine defense," Snyder said.

"And I don't think in R.C.'s tenure that that has changed at all. I think that's always been the case, and again, they are a very, very fine defensive football team."

That they are — here's a quick statistical breakdown.

Through seven games, the Aggies rank first in the Big 12 and sixth in the country in scoring defense, second in the conference in turnover margin and rush defense, and third in the league and 13th nationally in total defense.

Not too shabby, considering K-State's much-heralded defense is below Texas A&M in a couple of those categories. Then, on top of all that, throw in a talented A&M quarterback named Mark Farris and things really start to get interesting.

So, do the Wildcats have something to be concerned about when the Aggies and Wildcats converge this weekend?

I'll use one of tailback Josh Scobey's favorite press conference sayings to sum this one up — "Most definitely."

Especially with K-State's inconsistent offensive outputs the past two weeks against Oklahoma and Texas Tech, traveling to College Station looks to be a daunting task.

Plus, the Aggies are coming off an impressive 30-7 victory over Iowa State, in which the "Wrecking Crew" held the nation's 12th best offense to a season-low 239 total yards.

A&M also could very well ride the emotional high from the Aggies' upset of K-State in the '98 Big 12 Championship, which still lingers to a certain extent in the minds of Wildcat faithful.

Will Jonathan Beasley and the Cat offense be ready to stifle the Aggie "D" led by linebackers Brian Gamble and Jason Glenn? That'll be the question, Saturday, but don't expect Kyle Field to welcome K-State by any means.

Now, this 80,650 capacity stadium is simply engaging. A&M is ranked as the nation's fourth-toughest place to play in terms of home winning percentage in the 1990s (.925), behind Florida State, Nebraska and Florida.

Pit that with an unruly crowd known as the "Twelfth Man" filled with a bunch of swaying and, of course, kissing, you certainly can expect a few distractions. In fact, expect the K-State/A&M game to sellout and enter the Aggie's top-10 all-time crowds list this weekend.

There's usually much celebration on the field as well. Texas A&M boasts a sparkling 63-6-1 record at Kyle Field during Slocum's tenure as head coach, posting eight undefeated seasons at home.

Yet, the fact that their 22-game win streak in College Station was snapped this season simply baffles me.

Colorado, of all teams?

Gary Barnett and the Buffaloes (1-6) only win this year came over the Aggies, and it was at A&M's house. Don't expect me to explain that mystery to anybody.

Maybe Snyder can.

But I won't ask him. I'd rather let this Saturday tell the story.

Derek is a K-State sophomore in print and electronic journalism. You can e-mail him at dnb8765@ksu.edu.

Home-field advantage key to K-State/A&M game

JASON LINCOLN

College football — a place where stadiums, fans and mascots take on a single personality that mysteriously turns the table in favor of the home team.

Two schools that know as much about home-field advantage as any in the nation, K-State and Texas A&M, will collide this Saturday.

The Wildcats enter riding a No. 10 national ranking with one of the highest-scoring offenses in Division I. The Aggies, despite being unranked, have Kyle Field to their favor.

A&M watched their 22-game home winning streak, the nation's third longest, come to an end Oct. 7 with a loss to Colorado.

In 1996, it just happened to be Colorado that ended another of coach R.C. Slocum's long win streaks. The Aggies ended up going .500 in Kyle Field that season with three wins and three losses.

Saturday, the Aggies will stare that possibility in the face once again as they look first to the 10th-ranked Wildcats and then to the third-ranked Oklahoma two weeks later. A&M already has its three wins this season. Now, it wants to restore the mystique to Kyle Field and start the next streak with wins over top-10 opponents.

But K-State is no stranger to home-field advantage, with the nation's second longest, in Manhattan. Add that to its ranking, a 60-game win streak over unranked opponents and the bitter memory of its upset in the 1998 Big 12 Championship that kept the Wildcats out of the national championship game and K-State appears to be in perfect position for the win.

That is where Kyle Field enters the equation. Saturday will feature the largest crowd of Aggies ever to be on hand for an A&M football game. The A&M athletic ticket office is expecting a turnout of more than 85,000 to watch the first rematch of the teams since the Big 12 Championship in December 1998.

That crowd will be almost all maroon. K-State was only provided with 4,000 tickets.

"It's going to be a great atmosphere," head coach R.C. Slocum said. "If you can't get excited about this one, you're in the wrong business. This should be the largest crowd of A&M supporters to ever see a game. The fans will definitely be revved up."

A lot of emotion will highlight Saturday's game. On K-State's part, it will be the memory of the last time the teams met. On A&M's part, it will be trying to reenter the top-25 and re-establish Kyle Field as one of the true x-factors in college football.

Results cannot be predicted through polls

By CHARLIE MORASCH
Kansas State Collegian

As the close race between George W. Bush and Al Gore continues, many say the polls for the 2000 election should not be completely trusted and should be examined with scrutiny.

Statistics professor John Boyer said the way polls are conducted doesn't help the public see day-by-day differences.

"It has to do with the notion of random selection of people who get polled," Boyer said. "What happens is that, despite our best efforts to draw representative samples, the only thing a random sample guarantees is that we'll get the right result in the long run. Any one sample that is drawn may not be quite representative of the whole population."

ELECTIONS 2000

Boyer said that representation is meant to be covered by the margin of error percentage that accompanies poll statistics.

"Statisticians have a way of quantifying that, and that's why you typically see a plus or minus 3 percent, or plus or minus 4 percent with the poll results," he said.

Dale Herspring, head of the department of political science, said the 2000 presidential race is still too close to call.

"When the margin of error is 3 or 4 percent and one candidate is up by one point, that means the race is too close to call," Herspring said. "If one candidate was up by 10 points, then it would be accurate."

Chris Linklater, senior in computer science, said he has been following the presidential race and that he believes the polls cannot predict a winner in a race that appears to be close.

"I don't think you can say one or the other is winning," Linklater said. "Just because the margin of error is a lot bigger than the 1-percent lead either Gore or Bush is supposed to have is still smaller than the margin of error."

Boyer said that even when candidates have a large enough lead to be outside of the margin of error, the polls cannot necessarily be trusted.

"Even when a candidate is winning by more than the possible margin of error, that isn't necessarily accurate," Boyer said. "While we say that we are 95 percent sure, about a sample, there is still that 5 percent outside chance that we drew a really bad sample."

Boyer said another reason people must approach the polls cautiously is because the way the presidential election relies on the electoral college, and not a popular vote from the entire nation.

"When the election's over people are going to ask, 'Who won the popular vote?,' but you can win the election with barely over a quarter of the popular vote by winning in just over half of the 50 states and by getting just over half of the votes in those states."

Linklater said he believes the election will hinge on the larger states' electoral votes.

"I think the popular vote will end up being close to 50-50," Linklater said. "It's just a question of who wins the close races in the big states, like Florida and California."

Fright Night chance to meet teams

By NICK BRATKOVIC
Kansas State Collegian

Fright Night Five will be a chance to see two basketball teams, get candy and have a little fun, organizers said.

The event, beginning at 6 tonight, will be the fans' first opportunity to see the 2000-01 teams up close. K-State men's head coach Jim Wooldridge said it will be a chance for fans to interact with the two programs.

"We live in a college town, and our community wants to know who are players are and get to know our coaches and players," said Wooldridge, whose family will be attending the event. "This format allows us to do just that, to give people some ownership in the program and have fun with it. That is why we are here."

The concourse activities are sponsored by campus organizations which will be passing out candy and doing face painting.

When the runways clear and the trick-or-treaters find their seats, it will be the two teams' chance to entertain, a section of the program that will emphasize basketball, Mike Mores, assistant director of promotions, said.

"The trick-or-treating is a part of it," he said, "but we would like the university and the students to come out and get that first real feel of the two teams."

The teams will have a different look, too. The Pi Kappa Phi members build city play ramp

By APRIL MIDDLETON
Kansas State Collegian

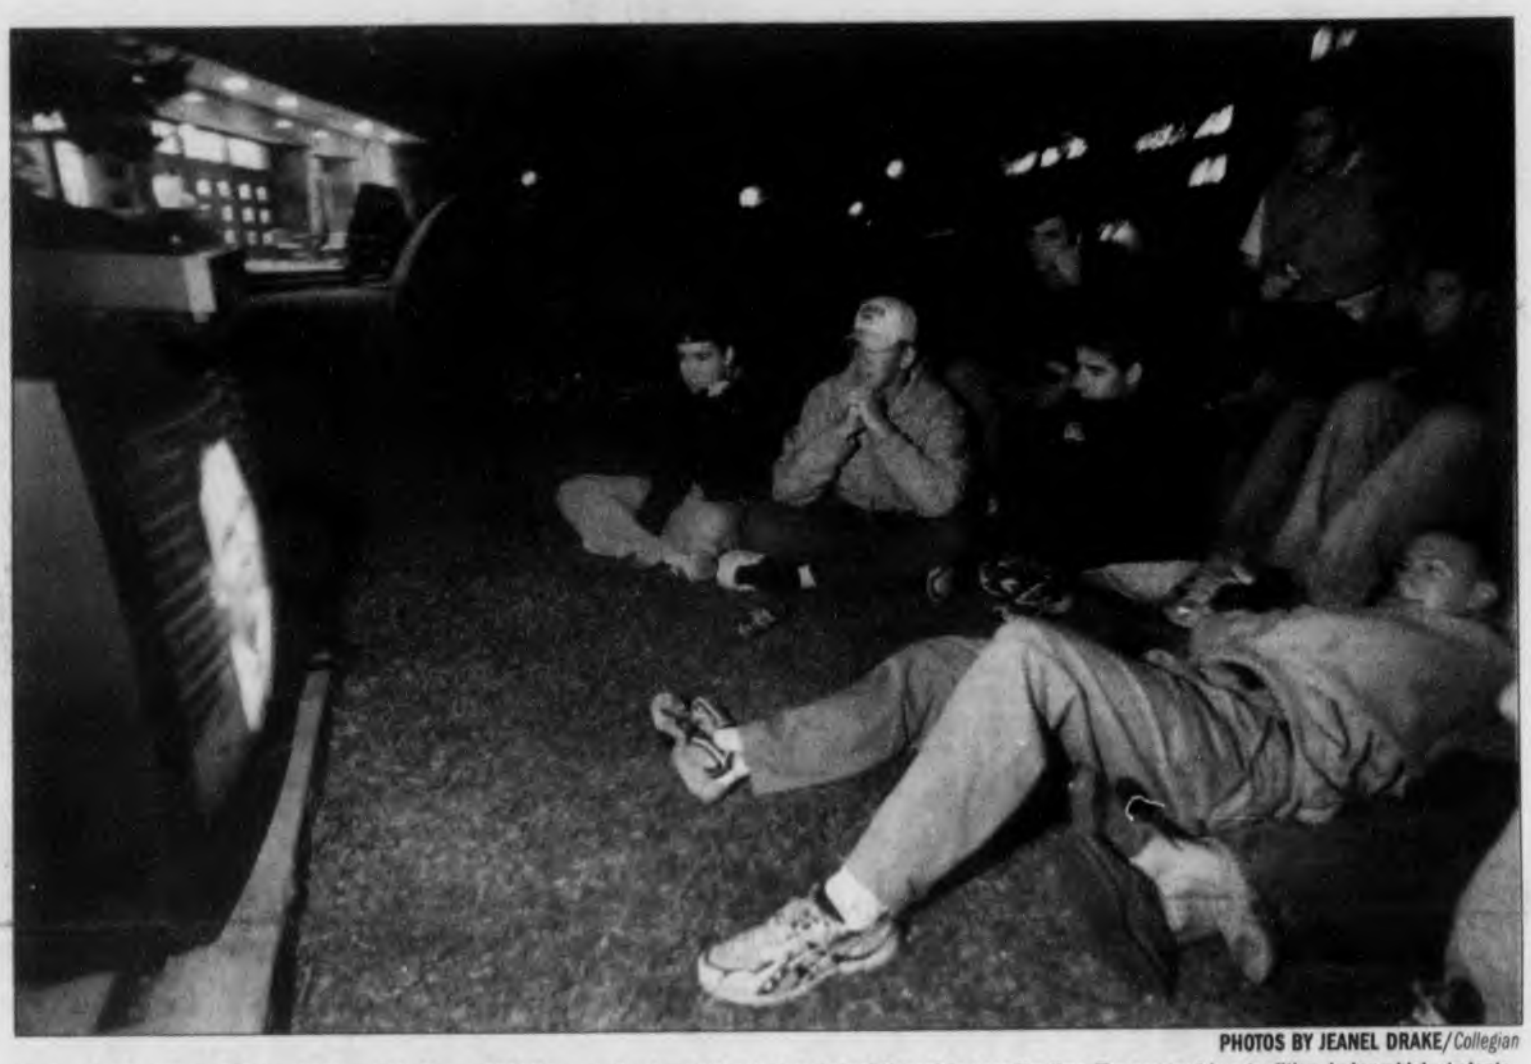
K-State's chapter of Pi Kappa Phi fraternity and more than 40 members from chapters across the Midwest assisted Friday and Saturday in the construction of a 94-foot-long handicapped-accessible play ramp at Frank Anneberg Park.

John Schalekamp, student philanthropy chairman, said Push America, Pi Kappa Phi's national outreach program, committed $10,000 last spring to help the Manhattan Department of Parks and Recreation purchase the play structure.

Mike Huff, Manhattan parks and recreation supervisor, estimated the total cost of the play structure was $30,000.

"Push America's grant was important to get the structure going," Huff said. "The remaining costs came from both municipal funds and private donations."

Huff said the Little Apple Pilot Club has promised a long-term commitment to the completion of the project also.



The play ramp will be the largest feature in the city's handicapped-accessible playground. The ramp will be in the middle of the play area, connecting a sensory garden and elevated plaza to the ground level.

Huff said four play stations will be situated along the ramp. The ramp is designed so that children can enjoy it, but is specially designed to accommodate children who use wheelchairs for mobility.

"There is a certain percent of our population who have a disability of some sort. We didn't have anything like this that was totally accessible," Huff said. "We've created a play area that everyone can enjoy, but can specially accommodate those with a disability."

With their PlayStation, VCR and movies at hand, Brad Hodnefield and his friends sat on their couch outside of Ahearn Field House on Sunday night.

"Looks like we're staying up all night, grubbing and watching movies," he said.

Those participating in the men's and women's annual basketball campout were served hamburgers, chips and pop by members of the teams. Hodnefield and his friends rented a generator and set up a tent for the night.

"I came for the fun of it, for getting a head start on the basketball season and to hang out with my friends," Hodnefield, freshman in business, said.

He and his fraternity pledge class were nominated to pick up tickets for their entire fraternity, he said.

Anyone who wishes to help with the Halloween events in Aggieville should contact the Aggieville Business District. Volunteers are needed to direct children across streets

By MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

The Aggieville Business Association is giving the younger citizens of Manhattan the chance to party in the 'Ville' for the 11th straight year.

From 6 to 8 p.m. on Tuesday Aggieville businesses will be passing out candy and providing other Halloween activities for children. The association also uses the event as a fund-raiser for the Flint Hills Breadbasket, said Cheryl Sieben, director of the Aggieville Business Association.

"We're collecting food for the breadbasket. Kids can donate two cans of food, and they'll get a coloring book and a trick-or-treat bag," Sieben said.

"Collection points will be located at the intersections. There will also be pumpkin decorating, where they can make a donation and decorate a pumpkin to take home with them."

In addition to passing out candy, some stores go beyond the norm. For instance, the Dusty Bookshelf is transformed into a haunted bookstore, and the employees of Streetside Records all dress up in costumes.

For Diane Meredith, owner of the Dusty Bookshelf, the activities are just an extension of her love of the holiday, she said.

"Halloween is my favorite holiday," Meredith said. "The bookstore is the perfect place for a haunted house. It lends itself to it. I had a haunted bookshelf for my niece and nephew when they were little, and it just expanded. All the kids like it, even the

K-State-Salina sponsors run to benefit United Way

Students at K-State-Salina ran for pumpkins and the United Way on Saturday morning.

K-State-Salina's Student Governing Association sponsored the 3rd annual Pumpkin Run on Saturday morning for the students of K-State-Salina and the community.

Mike Higley, sophomore in technology management and SGA president, said the run has been successful in involving the community in student life at the Salina campus.

"The run is a great way to get the community involved in K-State Salina," Higley said. "We have always had a good turnout, and everyone in town is very supportive."

The 5K run began at 8 a.m. Saturday morning and took about 17 minutes for the first runners to cross the finish line.

Nick Sulzen, sophomore in computer information systems and SGA community service chair, said the event did not attract as many people as it did last year, but they still had a good turnout.

"We had 42 participants in the run," Sulzen said. "Last year, there was about 50-60 participants, so it was not quite what it was last year, but it still went well."

Sulzen said the participants were divided into male and female groups of ages 18 and under, 19-30, and 31 and up. He said the winners received medals and pumpkins for their efforts.

"The weather was not too rainy, and the runners had an easy run because of the cool weather," Sulzen said. "It went smooth altogether."

Higley said the Pumpkin Run is one of the many activities K-State-Salina SGA has been working on to involve the community.

"We also are sponsoring a Haunted Hike for people in the community to come to," Higley said. "We are having the hike from 9 p.m. to midnight until Monday night."

Higley said the proceeds from the Pumpkin Run are going to the United Way and SGA looks to the run as a positive thing that K-State-Salina and the community do together.

"It is great to have so many people from the community come out and run with us," Higley said. "It is great for us to interact with the people in the community so everyone can realize we are here and a part of the community too."

Trick-or-treating event attracts children, businesses

By NANCY HULL
Kansas State Collegian

Clutching the trunk of her elephant costume, 2-year-old Julia Henry pointed to a partridge in a wire cage at Sunset Zoological Park on Saturday evening.

Her mother, Erika Luna, said Julia had been in her Halloween costume all day in anticipation of Spooktacular, the zoo's annual two-day trick-or-treating event.

"She loves the zoo and loves candy," Luna said. "She couldn't wait until I got off work and brought her here."

Saturday was the first time Luna attended Spooktacular.

"We just moved here, so we're trying to get acquainted with everything and everybody," she said.

Regardless of why people visited the zoo's Halloween event, Eileen Bauer, director of marketing and development, said there was a great turnout.

"There was a little line Saturday before we opened the gates at 4, and the parking lot was full in less than an hour," Bauer said.

Trick-or-treaters visited the zoo either from 4 to 7 p.m. Saturday or 1 to 4 p.m. Sunday. There were costume contests every half hour in the Chautauqua Amphitheater.

Those in attendance entered contests including creative animal costume, most creative non-animal costume, scariest animal costume and scariest non-animal costume.

More than 30 businesses were on site to hand out candy along zoo trails. Plinko, Wheel of Fortune and other carnival games were offered on the trails.

"We made it so there are lots of things the little kids can win, and there are games to challenge the older ones," Bauer said.

Ten-year-old Lauren Day said the games are her favorite part of the Spooktacular event.

"I come here so I can win suckers and free candy," Day said. "I've won lots of bugs and lizards too," she said in reference to the plastic prizes in her pumpkin trick-or-treating basket.

Face painting was also an option at the event. Six-year-old Morgan Dillon had a butterfly painted across her face, and she said it looked good with her silver Hershey's Kiss costume.

"I like to come here to see the animals and have my face painted," Dillon said.

Bauer said a key reason why the zoo's annual event remains popular is that parents feel comfortable bringing their children to Spooktacular.

"Parents can get concerned about the Halloween environment," Bauer said. "This is a safe place for everyone to have fun with Halloween."

2 renowned writers featured at literary festival

By JESSICA PITTS
Kansas State Collegian

Two established writers and one "rising star" were featured at the Flint Hills Literary Festival Thursday through Saturday at Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art.

Brett Lott, whose novel, "Jewel," was selected by Oprah Winfrey for her book club, was the first featured presenter Friday. He read from his recently released book, "The Hunt Club," during his presentation.

Zac Stuckey, sophomore in public relations and marketing, attended Lott's lecture as part of a requirement for his creative writing class.

"Even though I was required to go, I really found it interesting," Stuckey said. "He only read two chapters but it really hooked me into the book. I am thinking about reading the rest of it."

Patricia Hampl, the author of several nonfiction books, including "A Romantic Education" and "Virgin Time," was the second featured writer who spoke Saturday.

Finishing off the Literary Festival on Saturday was poet Derick Burleson, a rising star in the literary world, according to Elizabeth Dodd, director of creative writing.

"His readings are fascinating," Dodd said. "He is a great storyteller. His book entitled 'Ejo' is based on his experiences as a Peace Corps volunteer in Rwanda just before the civil war.

"The way he tells the story is just hair-raising. It is very moving and dramatic to hear how he escaped just before the war broke out."

Dodd said she was glad to have Burleson visit K-State because of his connection to the university.

"He obtained his master's degree from here in 1990," she said. "We really were proud and delighted to have him back to the place where his creative writing career began."

All authors were issued an invitation to the event by the creative writing committee, composed of all creative writing faculty, one literature faculty member and three student representatives.

"We usually have themes that we try and base our selection around," Dodd said. "But this year we just decided to go with authors that we had an interest in."

Dodd said Lott and Hampl were selected because of their widely known books.

"Those two are national authors who many people have heard of and have enjoyed their books," she said. "Burleson was selected not only because of his wonderful book, but because of his connection to K-State."

The Literary Festival also featured a series of brief readings by K-State creative writing students in conjunction with a "gallery walk" of exhibits at the Beach art museum.

"The students were given an opportunity to choose a piece of art and write about it," Dodd said. "It gave us a chance to bring the visual arts and the literary arts together."

Dan Papsdorf, senior in creative writing, was one student who took advantage of the opportunity. He wrote in response to a sculpture entitled "Cronos."

"I read a piece last year and I really enjoyed it, so I thought I would try again this year," Papsdorf said.

"There was actually quite a few people there, which surprised me because usually not a lot of people come out to the literary festival. But I think they enjoyed it because there were some good speakers throughout the whole weekend."

Building bridges and working in community service paid off for the K-State student chapter of the Associated General Contractors of America when it was awarded the Outstanding Student Chapter Award on Saturday morning.

Dave Fritchen, head of the Department of Architectural Engineering and Construction Science, said the award is a big achievement for AGC because it competes against 150 other schools for it.

"This is a big deal to us because it reflects all the work we did over the year," Fritchen said. "Being the No. 1 chapter in the nation is very impressive."

AGC adviser Jim Goddard said the students received the award from the national AGC for their extensive community service work.

"They have spent tremendous hours working on projects and in the community," Goddard said. "They deserve everything in the way of the award."

Goddard said AGC built a bridge for the handicapped over a drainage area at Tuttle Creek Reservoir and has worked with third and fifth graders at local elementary schools.

Although the award was given for work done in the 1999-2000 school year, Katie Crawford, senior in construction science and AGC treasurer, said the award has encouraged the group to work as hard as it did last year.

"Although I was not an officer in charge last year, the award has given us a reason to work hard once again," Crawford said. "We were all involved last year and are going to see what we can do to win again."

Goddard said AGC is working on projects on the Konza Prairie and in local elementary schools again.

"The students in AGC are always working on a project and trying to think of future things they can do as well," Goddard said.

Crawford said the award means a lot to the chapter and has encouraged it to take on new and exciting tasks so it can win the award again.
